

Register of Leases and Deeds 1682-1719

Introduction: This is the first volume in the series Register of Leases and Deeds. These were the official ledgers for recording legal instruments relating to property at St Helena. It enrolled copies or abstracts of leases and deeds of conveyance, stating the parties, dates, descriptions of land or houses, terms and consideration. These entries served as public notice and evidence of title.

Source: Images of the original records can be viewed on the British Library's website: <https://eap.bl.uk/archive-file/EAP1364-1-7-19>.

Text Transcription This transcription was produced by AI from handwritten document images held on the British Library's website, at about thirty pages per hour. Given the limitations described below, the text should be regarded as unreliable and used only as a search-and-find shortcut: once a relevant section has been located, it must always be checked against the source image via the hyperlinked Film Numbers listed in the main transcription table below.

Three specific problems affected the work. First, AI tends to prioritise meaning and readability at the expense of fidelity to the original, with a strong disposition to normalise spellings, expand abbreviations, and adjust grammar. It is particularly weak with unfamiliar surnames, and scrawled signatures often resist accurate transcription entirely. Transcriptions by eye of documents spanning four centuries have also shown that a single surname could be written in a wide variety of ways: the Crowie family name appears under six different spellings, and the Isaacs family name under sixteen. Searches for surnames are therefore hindered both by genuine variations in the originals and by mistranscriptions introduced by AI, and for this reason are best run phonetically. Second, the AI struggled with the late secretary hand, the script commonly used from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries, in which the letter S appears in a form closely resembling a trailing L. Third, occasional passages in these volumes are written in a hand so obscure or poorly formed as to be difficult to read even by eye, sometimes compounded by heavy ink bleed-through from the reverse side or by the loss of sections of pages.

To mitigate these difficulties, a strict protocol was applied to each image, requiring the AI to rely solely on clearly visible ink strokes and to flag any uncertain reading, thereby reducing the risk of inferred or invented text. Two conventions are used. [...] marks text that could not be read with confidence; this may represent a single unreadable word, a full sentence, or occasionally an entire paragraph. Square brackets around letters or words indicate a conjectural reading supplied by the transcriber: brackets around a whole word, for example [Bazett], mean the entire word was unclear and a probable reading has been supplied, while brackets around individual letters within an otherwise readable word, for example B[a]z[e]tt, mean only those specific letters were unclear in the source and the unbracketed letters were legibly present.

Modern Summary and Analysis Each section of text was submitted for AI analysis in order to explain the archaic language in clear, modern UK English. These are not direct sentence by sentence replacements, but explanatory interpretations intended to clarify meaning while preserving the substance of the original. Where a specific individual is named within a section of the original text, that person will generally also be identified within the explanatory interpretation. However, where the original consists largely of lists of names, these are not usually repeated in the explanatory text.

Each text modern summary is followed by two forms of AI-generated analysis. The first, an Interpretations section, draws on wider information located on the internet to provide additional commentary on the material. The second, a Speculations section, offers one or more possible reflections on what the document might further suggest. The value of these notes ranges from the profound to the trivial or self-evident; time did not permit deletion of the latter.

Text Loss: The volume exhibits consistent foxing, with visible ink bleed-through from the verso of each page.

Referencing Text Locations: A dual numbering system has been adopted, combining the British Library film number with the manuscript's original page number. These are presented in the format: British Library Film No. / Document Page No.

Content: This volume contains several land boundary sketches. Because these sketches appear faintly on darkened pages, the contrast has been increased to improve visibility - though this also makes ink bleed-through from the reverse of each page more noticeable. To keep file sizes manageable, the images are provided at limited resolution and cannot be enlarged without loss of quality. For higher-quality versions, please refer to the original film images on the British Library website.

Pagination: Most righthand pages are numbered. Page numbering begins on Film No. 6 (i.e. 6/1) and continues sequentially without a break through to the end of the volume.

Dates: During the period covered by this volume, England and its colonies followed the Old-Style Julian calendar, under which the legal new year began on 25 March (Lady Day). When creating the modern interpretations of these texts, the AI has automatically adjusted the dates. For any date quoted in these early St Helena records falling in the period between January and 25 March, the year has been moved forward to the modern equivalent. Month names were frequently rendered using Roman calendar abbreviations such as 7ber, 8ber, 9ber and 10ber, in which September through to December were counted as the seventh to tenth months.

The period spanned by this volume includes the the administrations of Captain Richard Kedgwin/Keigwin (1673-1674), Captain Gregory Field (1674-1678), Major John Blackmore (1678-1690), Captain Joshua Johnson (1690-1693), Captain Richard Kelinge or Keeling (1693-1697) and Captain Stehen Poirier (1697-1703), Thomas Goodwin (1707-1708), Captain John Roberts (1708-1711), Captain Benjamin Boucher (1711-1714), Matthew Bazett (1714-1714), Captain Isaac Pyke (1714-1719) and Edward Johnson (1719-1723).

AI Generated Summary

Introduction

The records examined here open with the jury impanelled on 26 September 1682 to register every allotment, sale, exchange and gift on the island, and run forward through nearly four decades of conveyances, leases, quit-claims and Company grants to the elaborate lives-based leases executed at the Castle in James Valley in 1719. Throughout, St Helena lay under the proprietary authority of the East India Company under royal charter, and every grant bound the holder to maintain true faith and allegiance to the reigning monarch and to the Company and to obey the laws of the island. The political settlements of 1685, 1689 and 1714 appear in successive regnal-year datings of the deeds. The entries span the earliest planter conveyances, household gifts and inheritance settlements; the consolidation of Chapel Valley as the urban core of James Town; the institutional reforms launched by Governor John Roberts in 1711; the great administrative sitting of 4 August 1713 at which at least seventeen instruments were sealed in one day; and the introduction by 1719 of a novel lives-based leasehold tied to detailed planting and fencing covenants. The records are not a complete picture of island life: they are the Company-controlled paper trail of one valuable asset in a colony whose economy depended on garrison employment, Company victualling, the Atlantic and Indian Ocean trades, and the persistent presence of enslaved labour. ### The Company's System of Land Tenure on the Island

The institutional framework rests on the Company's claim to be the underlying Lords Proprietors of St Helena. Every grant describes the Honourable United Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies in that capacity, and every freehold or leasehold confirmation is made in its name. The form is striking because it conflates a private joint-stock company with proprietary lordship of the kind awarded in the Carolinas or the Bahamas. The deeds draw on standard English freehold conventions, including the formula of holding of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly due and accustomed, but the substance is closer to a corporate tenancy: there were no chief lords other than the Company itself, and references to ancient services were notional. Five categories of Company land appear: granted freeholds, the Company's waste, the Company's common, the great plantation, and Company lot land. The Company also acted as a land bank, taking parcels back in exchange for others, as when George Hoskinson surrendered seven acres formerly Richard Stay's for ten in Peak Gult, and Edward Heath gave up ten formerly Samuel Jeffrey's. [Film No. 13, 23, 59, 86]

Leasehold ran alongside freehold from an early date. Elizabeth Rhodes, acting as her absent husband's attorney, granted John Cotgrave a 99-year lease of the Rhodes plantation in Sharks Valley in October 1687 at a peppercorn rent payable on Michaelmas, a near-perpetual tenancy in the established English form. The Company let Sandy Bay land on 21-year terms at four shillings an acre from the 1690s, John Toster taking ten acres in March 1694, and by 1705 these shorter terms were being extended to 99 years on application, as Paul Charles obtained for the same Sandy Bay parcel. John Orchard's 1703 lease of ten acres at Peter Bagley's at an annual seven shillings exemplified the early generous form, with all such leases freely assignable. By the late 1690s the Company also worked through multiple tenure forms simultaneously, with some land held as outright freehold descended from the 1682 inquest, some on long 99-year leases at low rents, and some held informally. [Film No. 42, 40, 41, 79, 82]

The 6 April 1711 consultation under Governor John Roberts marked the central institutional turning point. It acknowledged frankly that since the retaking of the island from the Dutch in 1673 the inhabitants had not been fixed in their estates and that lands lay unfenced and without landmarks. The council revived a three-year period running from 25 March 1709 to 25 March 1712, with forfeiture as the sanction for any planter who failed to fence in his land. The Thomas Bagley lease of 25 March 1711 set the new pattern: a 21-year term, an annual rent of five shillings per acre (four shillings plus one shilling administrative duty), an obligation to leave the land in as good a condition as at the start, and a prohibition on alteration of boundary marks or disposal of the lease without the consent of the governor and council. The Doveton, Coulson, Reder and Henry Francis leases of April and June 1711 all followed the same template. The 21-year ceiling and the disposal restriction closed off the open market in leasehold interests that had previously operated through private assignment. [Film No. 86, 88, 91, 94, 96, 102, 106, 110, 113]

By 1719 a third tenure type appeared. The new lives-based lease ran on the natural lives of three named nominees (typically the tenant's wife and children) and was renewable on the death of any nominee on payment of half a year's rent at each admittance. The Antipas Tovey, James Greentree, Arthur Bradley, Edmond Nichols, James Vesey, John Alexander and John French leases of 1719 all follow this template, transposing English copyhold practice onto a small island plantation economy. The model preserved the Company's reversionary interest, its supervision over disposal, and its ability to enforce a new generation of improvement covenants across multiple generations of tenants. [Film No. 244, 245, 248, 249, 250, 252, 260]

Establishing Title: Juries, Consultations, Company Deeds and Public Notice

The oldest mechanism for fixing title is the jury verdict. The 1682 inquest worked retrospectively, calling sworn jurors to trace each parcel by the formula of butting and bordering its neighbours, with title resting on social memory and the repeated phrase formerly the allotment of preserving each chain back to the original Company grant. The 1708 executors of William Dufton obtained a jury direction dated 24 March 1708 to fix the boundary between estate and buyer on the ground, showing the early-modern English jury still doing practical surveying work in a colonial setting more than two decades later. By the 1690s the formal conveyance had replaced the inquest as the principal mechanism, with each deed opening with the seller's address to all Christian people and proceeding through the medieval English language of feoffment, with the Company standing as chief lord of the fee. A standard quiet-enjoyment covenant and warranty against earlier encumbrances completed the instrument. [Film No. 6, 14, 15, 61]

Where doubt remained, the quit-claim was used to settle the position. A quit-claim is a written release in which one party formally renounces any future right, claim or interest in a parcel that another party holds, without warranting the title itself. It extinguished residual interests rather than transferring ownership, and it gave the holder protection against later challenge. Henry Francis released any right of suit against Thomas Goodwin in 1704 over the Chapel Valley house Goodwin had bought from Edward Edmunds in 1700; the gunner's mate Stephen Child took £3 to release any claim to Thomas Allis's Deep Valley parcel in 1704. Where competing claims surfaced, the register accepted a written declaration without halting the transaction, putting any later purchaser on notice. By the 1710s the formal consultation followed by beat of drum had become the standard method for confirming long-standing but undocumented holdings. The grants of 17 April 1711 to Jonathan Doveton and John Leonard Coulson, of 9 June 1711 to James Reder, Gabriel Powell, Henry Francis and Samuel Jeffrey, and of 23 June 1711 to Grace Coulson all rest on a prior consultation hearing at which the council examined the claim, followed by public notice given by beat of drum on a fixed day. In a colony where literacy was limited and there were no newspapers or printed gazettes, the drum was the practical mechanism for assembling the inhabitants. [Film No. 19, 14, 50, 90, 92, 95, 98, 100, 101, 104]

The interval between a consultation and the sealing of the deed could be wide, and the framework used this elasticity to absorb older claims into the new documentary regime. Grace Coulson's confirmation of June 1711 rested on a consultation held back in 1699, and William Charles's of July 1711 likewise relied on a December 1699 finding, while Matthew Bazett's 1711 confirmation rested on a consultation of only ten days before sealing. Old and new cases moved through the same procedure side by side. The 4 August 1713 sitting at the Castle then processed at least seventeen instruments resting on consultations of 6 January, 3 February, 3 March and 17 March 1714 (recorded under old-style 1713), each in coordinated batches that cleared an entire valley-wide cluster of holders. Where title was contested or required formal adjudication, a court of judicature was held: Gabriel Powell's title to twenty acres formerly Jonathan Beale's and part of the lot land of the deceased Anthony Beale was determined at a court of judicature on 11 October 1711, with the freehold confirmed through right of his wife, the widow of Jonathan Beale. The mechanism reveals a layered institutional system in which simple beat of drum sufficed for uncontested cases while judicial trial resolved cases involving complex inheritance routes. [Film No. 105, 107, 118, 126, 127, 131, 133, 135, 137, 139, 141, 143, 197]

The documentary system itself nearly failed. By December 1707 the original register book had become unbound and decayed by rats, requiring John Alexander as clerk to copy every entry into a new book. The attestation, witnessed at Fort James by Thomas Goodwin as governor and three other senior figures, gave the recopied register the weight of the original. The April 1711 consultation also ordered that a new and separate register book be kept for plans and deeds, with the consultation itself entered as preamble. The deeds therefore appear at one remove from their original form, and occasional dating irregularities are probably artefacts of the copying. Several 1713 confirmations carry blank dates or absent witness panels, suggesting documents drafted in advance but not formally completed at the sitting, perhaps because heirs were absent from the island or because executorial responsibilities needed unwinding before settlement. By December 1713 the institutional record had become a working document of cross-reference, with leases such as Robert Marsh's referring to the register book itself for the fuller particulars of recent transactions. #### The Land Market: Sales, Exchanges, Gifts and Patterns of Accumulation

An active secondary market had developed before 1682. Chains such as Hemmen to Duffield to Alexander to Beale show parcels passing through three or four hands before reaching the holder of record. Consolidation followed: Captain Anthony Beale assembled a large estate at the head of Waterfall Valley; John Cleverlee played the same role in Sandy Bay. The most sustained example is Thomas Goodwin, first seen as a witness in 1683, recorded as a buyer in 1693, reassembling the Wakefield ten acres at Little Horsepad from Young and Crosbey by 1695, adding Fryer Valley acres from Coles in 1696, Sarahs Valley acres from Harper in 1694, the Edmunds Chapel Valley tenement in 1700 for £130 sterling (the only sterling transaction of the earliest period), and the French High Peak parcel in 1703. He rose from soldier to gunner's mate, deputy storekeeper, captain, deputy governor and finally governor. Family gifts ran alongside the cash market: Benjamin Seale conveyed ten acres at the head of Sharks Valley to his son-in-law Praise Pledger in January 1693 for natural affection and love, and Owen Bevan's September 1705 gift to his son-in-law Thomas Goodwin was deferred until after the death of both donors with a contingent remainder in favour of Goodwin's eldest son. [Film No. 6, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 36, 46, 22]

Prices moved within consistent bands. Ten-acre upland parcels at the heads of the main valleys ran at £8 to £15 in the 1680s and 1690s, exemplified by the 25 October 1687 sale of ten acres at the head of Fisher Valley by James Eastop to John Coole for £8 sterling and the 6 January 1700 sale by Thomas Dixon to James Casthope for £15. By 1709 Fryer Valley land was reaching nearly £3 13s 4d per acre, as in the 1 April

1709 sale by Robert Gurling to George Carne of fifteen acres for £55. Substantial composite estates with houses and improvements commanded far more: George Hoskison sold a dwelling house and fifty acres in branches of Chapel Valley to Gabriel Powell on 7 September 1706 for £350, the same sterling figure the Company would pay Lufkin a year later. The single largest cash transaction of the period, Richard Gurling's sale to George Hoskinson on 12 October 1706, conveyed land in two districts, a dwelling, 20,000 yams standing on Keeling land, fifty-five goats and £10 worth of hogs for £500 in bills payable in England, marking the integration of the colony's larger transactions into the wider London financial system. [Film No. 68, 57, 71, 73, 54, 67]

Beyond the bilateral Company-to-holder business, the 1711-1719 record preserves a vigorous private market alongside the Company tenure framework. George Carne and his wife Frances, sole executrix and widow of the late Thomas Goodwin gentleman, sold Captain Goodwin's House on the High Street of James Town to Henry Francis for £285 in May 1715, only weeks after their marriage. Antipas and Margaret Tovey conveyed about four acres in Sandy Bay to Mary Maxwell, spinster, in June 1713 for love and affection alone. Giles Hayes, montross, sold five acres in Fishers Valley to Isaac Wood for £30 in September 1712. Two institutional transactions stand out. The Company itself sold ten acres in Sandy Bay to Robert Bell for 200 dollars in August 1712, the parcel having reverted from Walter Belward; on the same day the council reassigned Belward's six-acre leasehold to Bell. George Carne's 30-acre freehold of August 1713 followed a similar reversionary path: 16 months later Carne assigned it back to the Company in December 1714 for £150, the parcel lying east of the Company's great plantation. The Company channelled the bulk of William Marsh's estate to Jonathan Doveton through a 90-acre confirmation of 4 August 1713, demonstrating institutional preference for consolidating substantial ground in established hands over family continuity. [Film No. 108, 111, 116, 115, 124, 129, 187]

The most expensive sale in the entire record is Elizabeth Haswell's conveyance of ten acres in Sandy Bay to John Alexander in May 1719 for £480, the parcel carrying a house, outhouse, all provisions and other buildings and reaching her by inheritance from her father Thomas Goodwin and her late husband Captain George Haswell, formerly deputy governor. The deed discloses for the first time that Elizabeth was a daughter of Thomas Goodwin, fixing a marital alliance between the Goodwin and Haswell households that probably underwrote Haswell's appointment. The most elaborate sequence is the Carne-Goodwin family settlement of November 1717 to April 1718. The death of George Carne, second husband of Frances Goodwin, prompted a public auction on 19 November 1717. His stepson John Goodwin bought the entire estate for the performance and payment of debts. On the same day Frances Carne sold to John Goodwin nine named enslaved people for £200 in gold and current money. John Goodwin then immediately leased the mansion house and the 89-acre Lemon Valley estate back to his mother for 99 years, releasing her into a sustainable widow's tenure. By April 1718 the rentals had been quit-claimed and Frances acknowledged as true and lawful owner on payment of £530 sterling. The cycle shows the family using formal documentary apparatus to satisfy creditors at auction without losing effective control of the property. [Film No. 149, 236, 237, 238, 241, 242, 243]

Geography of Settlement and the Description of Boundaries

The recorded landscape is dense with named valleys and ridges that anchored every boundary description: Waterfall, Chapel, Fryer, Sarahs, Sandy Bay, Fishers, Sharks, Lemon, Pleasant, Deep, Youngs, Saine, Swine, Swanleys, Plyers, Stocks and Dogwood Valleys, Manatee Bay, Broad Bottom, the High Peak and King's Peak, the Main Ridge, Halley's Mount, Lemon Valley Rock, Oak Gutt, Peak Gult, Blood Bottom, Gabriel's Gut, and the Little Horse Pasture. The single urban cluster on the island lies in Chapel Valley, the same place also called James Town and containing Fort James, the Castle, the storehouse and the church; the deeds use Chapel Valley, James Valley and James Town interchangeably for this one settlement. Urban parcels were measured in feet rather than acres. Specific working bynames mark particular pieces of ground: Smiths Plain, the Purslane Bed, the Great Wood Ridge, the Lemon Garden, Peter Bagley's, Two Gun Ridge, Writing Stone Ridge, Dennis Lock, Diana's Geak, Sexton's Ground, Halls Plain, Horse Pasture Plain, Black Egea, Pigsbaine Beds, Rupert's Bay and Manatee Bay all appear, persisting even after formal title had moved on. [Film No. 6, 18, 24, 28, 91, 95, 103, 169, 187, 192, 201, 204, 246]

The standard method of describing a parcel is by reference to its neighbours on four sides, producing an unintended cross-section of the planter community. The Powell freehold of 50.25 acres confirmed on 9

June 1711 was bounded by Francis Wrangham, James Reder, John Bowman and Company waste land formerly held by John Lufkin. Reciprocal boundary mapping operated systematically across the 4 August 1713 sitting: Gurling, Carne and Morris collectively mapped a single Fryer Valley cluster; Coles, Cason, Steward, Greentree and Bagley did the same for central Sandy Bay and Powell's Valley; James Greentree, Robert Addis and Mary Hoskison each named the others as boundary holders. Lieutenant Thomas Cason appeared as a boundary holder while simultaneously witnessing the very leases that named him. Henry Francis appeared on Francis Wrangham's northern boundary while witnessing Wrangham's deed and on Margaret Sich's southern boundary while witnessing hers. The pattern bound adjoining freeholders to the documentary record of each other's titles. [Film No. 98, 101, 90, 127, 133, 138, 142, 159, 173, 174, 195]

The introduction of formal plans annexed to deeds is a real institutional innovation of 1711. The Doveton grant of 17 April 1711 records annexed plots and plans drawn to a scale of ten chains or forty rods, with a copy entered in the register book. The William Alexander lease of 7 May 1717 expressly ties the fences to the annexed plan and treats them as legal landmarks. By 1713 the deeds also begin to use the East, West, South and North Divisions of the island, grouping individual parcels under named administrative quarters; estates were typically dispersed across multiple regions rather than concentrated in a single block. Mary Hoskison's 86-acre confirmation lay in three parcels at Horse Pasture Plain, under the High Peak and at the head of Lemon Valley. The Company's great pasture, great plantation, Perkins Plantation and Griffith's Ground appear as Company-managed agricultural establishments alongside private tenure. [Film No. 90, 91, 103, 195, 244]

People of the Record: Planters, Garrison, Widows and Recurring Families

Three social categories dominate. The first is the free planter, sometimes also styled freeholder. The Goodwin, Bevan, Bagley, Cotgrave, Coulson, Doveton, Reder, Francis, Powell, Greentree, Carne and Hoskison households all appear as long-standing free planters across multiple transactions. The second is the garrison and Company servant: soldiers, gunners, sergeants and ship's officers, including Thomas Dixon as sergeant, James Casthope, John Hemon, William Hartwell and Arthur Bradley as soldiers, John French and John Clavering as gunner and gunner's mate, and Henry Rawlins as East Indiaman. The third is the senior office-holder: governor, deputy governor and council members. The boundary between these categories is porous. Bartrant Audouart, the Company's smith, headed an established household; William Bidott served as surgeon; Robert Bell appears as planter and mason, Isaac Wood as cooper and later corporal, Robert Gurling as freemason. Courtesy titles tracked an upper layer: Mr for John Wynn, Robert Swallow and Edward Edmunds; Mrs for Grace Coulson, Elizabeth Johnson and Margaret Cotgrave; gentleman and finally esquire for Thomas Goodwin. The same individual could carry different designations across deeds of the same sitting. [Film No. 56, 58, 64, 69, 74, 77, 80, 84, 87, 103, 205]

Military rank threads continuously through the civilian record. Thomas Cason appears as ensign and free islander in his 1711 lease of Welley's Land, rises to lieutenant by August 1713 (when he both receives a further five-acre lease and witnesses at least sixteen instruments across the day's sitting), and to gentleman by December 1717. The progression from junior commissioned officer to working witness in the documentary regime illustrates how garrison promotion and land accumulation reinforced each other. Samuel Maxwell, corporal, who had bought a James Town message from James Draper in 1699 for £18 in cattle and Spanish dollars, leaves orphans who receive a nine-acre Sandy Bay freehold confirmation of their own in August 1713. Captain George Haswell, formerly deputy governor, holds Sandy Bay freehold developed before his death by May 1719. Samuel Algate, corporal, executes a marriage settlement in April 1714 placing his intended bride Mary Earle's eighteen-acre James Valley estate in the hands of Orlando Bagley and Charles Steward as trustees, with a proviso allowing him to recover the property only on the solemnisation of his marriage and licence to depart the island. [Film No. 117, 130, 146, 149, 218]

Women hold property across the record in every marital category. The clearest pattern is the wife acting as attorney for an absent husband: Prudence Sherwin for Thomas Sherwin in the 1694 Chapel Valley sale to Goodwin, and Mary Carne for George Carne across multiple transactions from 1705 to 1709. Married couples also signed jointly, as Arthur and Sarah Bradley did in October 1705 and the Frenches in March 1708, the joint sealing of the wife understood as the device for extinguishing any future widow's claim against the buyer. Widows are an especially substantial group of independent holders. Mary Barrington held her late husband Nathaniel's Saine Valley land in her own name in 1682. Sarah Harding held thirty acres in

Fryer Valley as the widow of Richard Harding. Margaret Sech's £140 settlement of 1705, by which she bought out her son Richard Swallow's reversionary interest in the Chapel Valley estate so the property could descend to her younger children by her second husband, illustrates the active legal role open to a remarried widow with executor's authority. Elinor Cotgrave's 1712 sale of seventy acres at Youngs Valley to John Alexander for £90 shows a widow holding and disposing of substantial rural land in her own name. [Film No. 6, 10, 38, 42, 44, 56, 64, 65, 71, 80, 85, 97]

Substantial widow holdings dominate the August 1713 sitting and the years that follow. Grace Coulson, widow, takes forty acres of freehold and a five-acre lease on a single day in June 1711, signing by mark rather than by signature. Frances Goodwin received absolute freehold of 89 acres formerly her late husband Thomas Goodwin's. Mary Hoskison was confirmed in 86 acres across three parcels in her own absolute name. Margaret Sich received seventy acres jointly with the heirs of her deceased husband John Sich, the double vesting preserving her settlement of her second-marriage children. Elizabeth Johnson received fifty acres in Broad Bottom jointly with the heirs of her deceased husband Joshua Johnson. Dorothy Hayes received twenty acres in Fishers Valley under her husband's will. Elizabeth Bowman, spinster and daughter of the deceased John Bowman, receives 75 acres in her own name in August 1713. Mary Conaway, widow, takes thirty acres at the head of Dogwood Valley. Frances Carne, widow and relict of the deceased George Carne, holds, sells, leases and finally repurchases her family estate across the 1717-1718 cycle. The institutional protection thus extended across spinster, wife, widow, executrix and attorney for an absent husband. [Film No. 105, 106, 111, 122, 123, 135, 145, 149, 161, 195, 175, 155, 185, 207, 210, 218, 236]

Inheritance patterns combine primogeniture, testamentary disposition and trustee arrangements. Primogeniture supplies the framework default, as with the confirmation to William Charles, son and heir of the late Paul Charles, in July 1711, and Benjamin Greentree, son and heir of the late John Greentree, in August 1713. Testamentary disposition could override it: Onesiphorus Steward's will distributed ten acres of cabbage tree land in three equal shares to his children Francis, Mary and Martha, vesting jointly in all three regardless of gender. The Harding children's 1713 confirmation took the parcel to the several sons and daughters of the late Richard Harding severally and jointly. The Maxwell orphans took directly in their own names. The Antipas Tovey-Richard Swallow indenture of 26 July 1714 constructs an explicit guardianship arrangement under which Swallow takes on the infant Margaret Bagley until she comes of age or marries, in return for an immediate transfer of three enslaved men and ten bonds. The recurrence of orphan estates across the August 1713 sitting (Harding, Bagley, Maxwell, Coales, Greentree, Beale, Leverdy, Alexander) marks 1713 as a year of unusually visible generational transition and points to high adult mortality in the planter class. [Film No. 118, 126, 137, 145, 146, 217]

Slavery and Coerced Labour

The 1706 indenture of Mary Oliver to George Carne, often cited alongside the enslaved transactions, in fact sits within a different legal category. Mary Oliver was a free woman, the daughter of the Black Oliver who had aided Captain Richard Munden's recovery of St Helena from the Dutch in 1673 and had been freed in recognition of that service. The indenture of 10 September 1706 by which Carne, described as merchant, bound Mary Oliver and her two children Mary and Elizabeth to serve him as menial servants until each came of age, with any future child likewise bound and a contingent seven-year term if all her children died, was therefore an indenture of voluntary bound service of the kind familiar in English parish practice, not a sale of an enslaved person. The arrangement converted what would otherwise have been a parish liability into a long-term labour supply for the Carne household. Mary Oliver signed by her mark, an O; Carne signed in his own hand. The deed nonetheless illustrates how heavily the freedom of a poor free Black woman was constrained by the documentary forms available to her, and how the institutional record drew the line between bound service and outright enslavement at a place that left little practical room for autonomy. The bynames Black Slewer and Black Oliver from 1682, and the Portuguese name Bento Pedro Demallo who settled accounts with Carne in 1706, point to a more mixed population than the dominant settler names suggest, with free Black inhabitants and continental European settlers present from an early date. [Film No. 27, 7]

Set against the Mary Oliver indenture stand the enslaved people who appear as fungible property in the registered deeds. Asher appears in the 1690 Trapp to Goodwin sale; Oliver (a different individual) in the 1703 Powell to Greentree sale of Sandy Bay land, transferred together with twenty acres and a half-share in a still for £86; Sue, formerly belonging to the estate of the late Leonard Coulson, in the 13 August 1708 exchange between Hugh Bodley and Jonathan Doveton, conducted as direct barter without cash; and Peter, a black boy whose service was transferred to Robert Leech as part of Susanna Doveton's 1708 apprenticeship arrangement. The 1711-framework deeds are largely silent about the enslaved population. The economically substantial plantations recorded across these files, sustaining yams, livestock and the production needed to provision Company shipping, almost certainly depended on enslaved and coerced labour, but the registered deeds direct their attention to the white planter holders. [Film No. 55, 64, 72, 75, 125, 135, 144, 148, 202, 159]

The 1713-1719 file makes enslaved labour far more visible. The Mary Jewister gift of February 1712 transfers Ned to her grandson Francis Wrangham, with the donor retaining the use and benefit of his labour during her lifetime; the deed records quiet possession given by the gift and delivery of the black, in the black's presence. The Tovey-Swallow indenture of July 1714 transfers K[a]tea, Lewis and Plaire as part of the guardianship arrangement for the infant Margaret Bagley. The Henry Francis to Francis Wrangham sale of March 1715 packages a house and a slave woman together for £70. The Sanders-Alexander deed of January 1718 sells the slave man Peter outright together with a widow's life interest in a James Valley messuage for £50. The Frances Carne to John Goodwin deed of November 1717 transfers nine named enslaved people (Toby, Harry, John, Demore, Chatham, Antony, old Jack and Lucas, the boy Will and the old woman Ar[an]ada) for £200 in gold and current money. The structure of these transfers is institutionally precise: property transfers between family members are routinely effected for nominal consideration of five shillings, preserving the documentary form of a sale while marking the substantive transaction as a family settlement, while the transfer of enslaved people is recorded at substantial actual prices with the same warranty and quiet enjoyment clauses used in real property conveyances. The institutional record thus distinguishes family ground (a quasi-gift) from human labour (a documented sale). [Film No. 209, 217, 220, 232, 236]

Wider context illuminates what the registers obscure. The early eighteenth century was the peak period of the Atlantic and growing Indian Ocean slave trades, and St Helena, lying on the principal Company shipping route between London and India, sat directly on those traffic lines. The institutional silence of the earlier registers on how Asher, Oliver, Sue or Peter reached the island, and on the broader question of how many enslaved people were present at any given moment, reflects the Company's preference for handling slavery through separate documentation rather than through the public land register. The naming of individuals in the Carne-Goodwin deed and the Tovey-Swallow indenture nonetheless establishes the file as primary evidence of named coerced labour at St Helena, although the documents tell us little of their lives, work, families or eventual fate. #### Lease Conditions, Improvement Clauses and Agricultural Obligations

Leasehold obligations hardened steadily across the period. The 1689 Stevens to Allis lease for eighteen years imposed only tax obligations and no positive improvement covenants. The Carne to Orchard lease of July 1707 added a wood-cutting restriction (cutting only as necessary, not to impoverish the land), a repair covenant, and a turkey-sharecropping clause under which Orchard kept two hens and a cock belonging to Carne and delivered half the young birds. The French to Hoskinson sub-lease of 24 July 1707 applied the same logic on a larger scale, with Hoskinson taking forty acres and 50,000 yams for eleven years in return for delivering 5,000 yams a year to the Frenches, yams thus serving as a rent in kind. The Lemon Garden lease to Paul Graton of 23 December 1707, at £30 7s 6d per year, fixed retail prices for bananas at sixpence each, lemon juice at two and sixpence per gallon, lemons at three shillings per hundred and banana bunches at two and sixpence each, reserved the dry leaves to the Company, and reserved a right of re-entry on default. The tenancy doubled as an instrument of antiscorbutic supply for the Company's ships. [Film No. 49, 31, 53, 52]

Every lease in the 1711 framework imposes the same structural obligations: rent of four shillings per acre plus one shilling duty due on Lady Day; an obligation to leave the fences in the same repair at the end of the 21-year term as they then stood; a prohibition on altering the fences, which served as the landmarks tied to the plan annexed to the lease; and a disposal restriction by which the lessee could not dispose of the lease without the consent of the governor and council. The disposal restriction represented a substantial departure from the earlier free assignability of long leases. Under the 1711 regime each transfer required

Company consent, with the consent mechanism giving the council an ongoing supervisory role over the personnel of the regularised landscape. John Roberts's personal 1-acre lease of August 1711 introduced an exceptional right of renewal at the same rate and terms, granted in consideration of the great charge Roberts had incurred in clearing barren ground and explicitly offered as encouragement to other improvers, the governor's own case placing the policy at the highest level of the establishment. The Manatee Bay lease to Samuel Price of 1713 went further still, requiring preservation of standing trees, planting of ten fruit trees per acre, building of a house, and an inheritance clause expressly directing the land to children rather than to a remarrying mother so it would not pass with the mother-in-law to be embezzled. [Film No. 106, 113, 119, 120, 138, 152, 204, 215, 227, 228]

The 1717 leases tightened the framework further. The Haswell lease of 7 May 1717 and the William Alexander lease of the same day, over fifteen acres at Sexton's Ground, added active agricultural and conservation obligations: maintenance of the existing tree population by replacement of any tree cut down or lost to wind or age, the planting of ten fruit trees per acre inside the fences, and planting along the inside of every fence in the Alexander case. The Haswell lease counted plantains and papayas within the fruit-tree quota, while the Alexander lease pointedly excluded plantains and figs from the count, forcing the lessee to plant more durable species. The exclusion looks like a deliberate response to lessees gaming the requirement by planting fast-growing low-value species. The Company was using lease covenants as instruments of agricultural policy: protecting the island's tree cover against depletion driven by ship's victualling, construction and fuel, while pushing the lessee toward fruit cultivation useful to passing East Indiamen. [Film No. 99, 103]

By 1719 the institutional response to environmental decline becomes systematic. The new lives-based lease introduced for Antipas Tovey, James Greentree, Arthur Bradley, Edmond Nichols, James Vesey, John Alexander and John French bound every tenant to fence the parcel immediately with a good and sufficient fence; to plant one acre in ten with timber trees once enclosed; to replant yearly on failure at the first, second or third planting; to plant lemon trees round the inside of every fence; to plant a further ten lemon or other good fruit trees for every acre of demised land; to replace any tree as it decayed; to keep the ground in good heart and repair and not to allow it to run out. The cumulative tree-planting obligation on an eighteen-acre lease produced commitments of approximately 180 fruit trees per parcel, on top of timber trees on one acre in ten and lemon trees lining every fence. The institutional intent of converting demised parcels into productive orchards or lemon gardens is express on the face of every 1719 deed. The Company had moved from passive collector of rents to active manager of agricultural and ecological policy on the island, with the leasehold instrument as its principal tool. #### Houses, Plantations and the Value of Improved Land

Houses added substantial value across the entire period. A twenty-acre Sarahs Valley parcel with a dwelling fetched £25 to £35 in the mid-1690s; the Goodwin acquisition of the Fox parcel from Harper at £35 in May 1694 added a forty per cent mark-up over four months, the difference accounted for partly by a reserved standing crop of yams that Harper bound himself to replant for Goodwin's benefit. Stone construction had its own recognition: the Toms to Allis stone house in Chapel Valley near Fort James fetched £8 10s in January 1688, the material explicitly named. Plantation improvements were enumerated in detail: houses, plantation, provisions, hedges, ditches, walls, water, watercourses and timber trees. Water rights were a distinct property element, with Sarah Sensney's watercourse grant of March 1703 to her father-in-law George Dweight binding the grantor's heirs in perpetuity. Timber acquired its own legal protection: the Jeffrey to Kersey memorandum of 1683 imposed a twenty-shilling penalty if the seller cut wood after the sale. [Film No. 16, 17, 18, 48, 21, 12]

Urban property carried a different scale: the Edmunds Chapel Valley tenement at £130 sterling in 1700 stood against rural twenty-acre parcels with houses fetching £25 to £35 in the same period, roughly four times the value of comparable rural holdings. Ordinary urban dwelling houses in James Town (Chapel Valley) moved at relatively stable prices of £20 to £50 through the late 1690s and 1710s. The Sherwin tenement bought by Goodwin in 1694 for £26 sold to Henry Francis in May 1709 for £50, doubling in value over fifteen years. The most extreme case is the Cleve to Greentree sale of 22 June 1715: £150 for a single James Valley house, ten times the price of ordinary urban property, because Cleve had rebuilt the old

Edward Bryan house into a substantially new dwelling during his ownership. The Carne developed Goodwin house in James Town reached £285 in 1715. The Haswell-Alexander sale of 1719 carried ten acres with house, outhouse, provisions and other buildings at £480, a rate of £48 per acre marking the highest documented per-acre figure in the entire record. Hydraulic and processing infrastructure shows up at several points: the weir on the Fox household's eighteen acres in Sandy Bay, and the half-share in a still transferred from Powell to Greentree in March 1703, reflect small-scale distilling and water-management installations whose half-ownership indicates partnership arrangements among neighbouring planters. #### Changes Over Time, 1682 to 1719

The most visible shift is the move from informal allotment registered by jury to formal Company deed and full freehold conveyance. The 1682 inquest worked retrospectively; by 1684 the Company was issuing direct grants under its common seal, the Bevan grant setting the model. The deeds from the 1680s and 1690s, exemplified by the Jaye to Edmunds Chapel Valley sale of 13 February 1683 with its mixed cash and goods payment and reserved yams and poultry for the seller, show a planter market operating without much institutional intervention. The deeds from 1707 to 1710 increasingly show the council acting as standing witnesses to substantial conveyances. The 1711 consultation and the subsequent freehold confirmations and leases brought all of this within an explicit Company framework with public notice, jury and consultation hearings, annexed plans, register entries and standardised rent and fencing covenants. By August 1713 the procedure had matured into coordinated all-day sittings in which seventeen or more instruments were executed in continuous session by the same small witness panel. By 1719 the Company introduced the lives-based lease with mandatory tree planting and orchard cultivation obligations, signaling a Company concern with environmental management running in parallel with its narrower interest in rent collection. [Film No. 6, 22, 63, 60, 86, 90, 105-110, 126-146, 244-263]

Land and building values moved upward. Fryer Valley land traded at ten shillings per acre in 1683, rose to £1 5s in 1691, settled at £1 2s in 1696, and reached £1 13s 4d by 1705; High Peak side land more than doubled, from nine shillings per acre in 1691 to £1 16s in 1703. Upland ten-acre parcels valued at £8 to £15 in the 1680s and 1690s were reaching £55 for fifteen acres of Fryer Valley by April 1709 and £70 for the same Bradley parcel less than three years after Belvard had taken it for 100 Spanish dollars plus cattle in October 1705. The Cleve James Valley house at £150 in 1715 marked the extreme of urban appreciation through rebuilding. There is, however, no straight inflationary curve: the records also include parcels that moved at consistent or even falling prices. Plot sizes show a parallel evolution. The first 1711 confirmations dealt in round multiples of ten acres, consistent with the old 1682-style allotments. By August 1713 the surveying programme was working to quarter-acre precision, with parcels of 1¼, 1¾, 2¼, 3¾ and 15½ acres entering the record. Consolidation became visible at both ends of the scale: Orlando Bagley reached approximately 99 acres across freehold, multiple leaseholds and assigned interests by August 1713; Charles Steward held 44 acres in Sandy Bay; Mary Hoskison 121 acres across her combined freehold and leasehold; Jonathan Doveton 140 acres. [Film No. 20, 21, 29, 34, 54, 120, 122, 124, 135, 142, 187, 195]

Tenant obligations evolved sharply over the period. The earliest deeds carried only the most basic covenants of quiet enjoyment and the suppression of competing claims. The 1711 leases added fencing requirements and disposal restrictions. The 1717 leases imposed active tree maintenance and fruit-tree planting at ten per acre. The 1719 lives-based leases imposed comprehensive tree-planting and orchard-cultivation requirements, with failure at the first, second or third planting triggering replanting obligations in perpetuity. The trajectory shows the Company moving from passive collector of rents to active manager of agricultural and ecological policy. Allegiance clauses shift from Charles II and James II in the 1680s to William and Mary in 1689-1691, to Queen Anne through 1713, and to King George I from 1714 onwards. Spanish dollars at 6 shillings each, store credit and cattle valued by two impartial appraisers gave way to gold and current money or lawful money of England as the medium for substantial transactions, reflecting the wider Atlantic and Indian Ocean monetary settlement following the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. The War of the Spanish Succession (1702 to 1713) is invisible in the deeds, but the institutional concentration of business in 1713 may not be coincidence; the Company's regularisation of its St Helena holdings would have benefited from the renewed stability of long-distance Indian Ocean trade. The role of women and inheritance becomes progressively more visible across the period, from boundary references through the formula in right of his wife to widows holding and disposing of substantial estates in their own absolute names. [Film No. 82, 88, 99, 103, 108, 116, 124, 215, 218, 224, 233, 236, 244]

Conclusions

From the September 1682 inquest to the formal Company lives-based lease of 1719 with its detailed planting and fencing requirements, the records trace a colony moving from informal allotment to bureaucratic administration, from a small and largely illiterate population dependent on neighbour memory to a settled society of named families, formal witnesses, courtesy titles and Company grantees. The 1711 reforms converted decades of informal allotment, inheritance and private trading into a documented regime of confirmed freehold and supervised 21-year leasehold, anchored by sealed deeds, annexed plans, beat of drum public notice and a working register book. The procedure was efficient enough to clear seventeen instruments in a single August 1713 sitting, supple enough to handle widows, orphans, military officers, artisans, executors, trustees and unlettered holders within the same documentary framework, and forward-looking enough to introduce the 1719 lives-based leasehold that would bind tenants across multiple generations through nominated lives. Land became more valuable, plots consolidated into working estates in the hands of capable accumulators, and the Company increasingly used its leasehold instruments to direct rather than merely register the use of the ground. [Film No. 6, 22, 105-154, 155-204, 205-263]

Yet the record is selective. The presence of Black Slewier and Black Oliver in 1682, the freed Black Oliver having aided Captain Munden's recovery of the island from the Dutch in 1673, the indenture of his free daughter Mary Oliver in 1706, and the Portuguese-named Bento Pedro Demallo settling accounts with Carne in the same year, all point to a more mixed population than the dominant settler names suggest. The enslaved labour that sustained the documented plantations enters the deeds as named individuals only when they are bought, sold, gifted or transferred as security: Asher, Oliver, Sue, Peter, Ned, K[a]tea, Lewis, Plaire, Toby, Harry, John, Demore, Chatham, Antony, old Jack and Lucas, Will and Ar[an]ada are visible only at the moment of transfer. The voice in every instrument is that of the Lords Proprietors, the named freeholder and the small literate circle of witnesses. The unlettered are visible only through their marks; the enslaved through marginal recitals; the wider community of working occupiers through the qualifier in the possession of attached to other men's land. The register was the Company's instrument, and its conventions shaped what could be recorded and what could not. Within those constraints, these records offer a remarkably detailed account of a small English colony in the South Atlantic across the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. [...] William Barrington held land formerly allotted to John Walls, lying in Saine Valley. It joined on the north to twenty acres formerly belonging to William Marsh, and on the south to twenty acres allotted to William Bowman. Walls sold this land to Mr John Wynn, who exchanged it with Nathaniel Barrington. The land now remained in the possession of Mary, the widow of Nathaniel Barrington. Carried over. Interpretations The jury impanelled on 26 September 1682 functioned as a formal mechanism for registering and verifying landholding on the island. By calling sworn jurors to record allotments, sales, exchanges and gifts, the company built an authoritative title record that bound future transactions. The procedure shows that property on St Helena was held under company authority but could be moved between settlers by private dealings, provided those dealings were eventually recorded through an official inquest. The repeated formula of butting and bordering, with each plot defined by reference to its neighbours rather than by survey coordinates, reveals how land was identified in practice. Title rested on social memory of who held what next to whom, and the jury's task was to fix that memory in writing. This made neighbour relationships and the identity of former holders central to the legal description of each parcel. The phrase formerly the allotment of, used repeatedly, marks the distinction between the original company grant and the current holder. The original allottee retained a kind of historical anchor in the record |

Plots passed through several hands by sale, gift and exchange, and the jury's role was to trace and confirm each link. The acreage figures in the right margin gave the registered quantity attached to each holding at the moment of the inquest. Captain Anthony Beale appears as a substantial accumulator, consolidating several adjacent ten and twenty-acre parcels at the head of Waterfall Valley. His pattern of acquisition, buying from multiple original allottees and from intermediate purchasers, illustrates how a well-placed officer could build a single sizeable estate out of fragments dispersed by the original allotment scheme. Mary Barrington's position as the widow holding Nathaniel Barrington's land shows that property descended to widows on the island and that they were recognised as the registered holder for the purposes of the inquest. The jury recorded her possession directly, without naming a male intermediary. Ensign Hooper and Sergeant Ralph Symes appear with their military ranks, indicating that members of the garrison held land alongside civilian planters and that rank was preserved in the land record as part of personal identification. Speculations The decision to convene a formal jury in September 1682 to record all allotments and their subsequent transfers points to a deliberate effort to clean up an accumulated tangle of private dealings. The repeated pattern of land passing through three or four hands before reaching the current holder suggests that earlier record-keeping had not kept pace with the secondary market, and the inquest was the company's response to that gap. Captain Beale's concentrated buying at the head of Waterfall Valley, drawing in parcels from Fox, Innett, Hemmen, Duffield, Alexander, Parram and Row, looks like a deliberate consolidation strategy rather than opportunistic purchases. Acquiring contiguous plots from several original allottees produced a single working estate, which would have been more efficient to manage than scattered holdings and would have given him control of the upper valley. The exchange between John Wynn and Nathaniel Barrington, followed by Mary Barrington's continued possession as widow, suggests that the exchange had been arranged for reasons connected to the Barrington household rather than as a simple commercial transaction. The land stayed in the family after Nathaniel's death, which indicates the exchange had given the Barringtons a holding they intended to keep. |

It joined on the east to the twenty acres formerly allotted to Thomas Birch described above, and on the west to twenty acres allotted to William Fox the younger. Griffong sold these twenty acres to Goodale, in whose possession the land now lay. Thomas Francombe held a lot in Fishers Valley, joined on the south to twenty acres allotted to William Rhoads, and on the west to [Diamas] Peak. William Rhoads held ten acres, being part of his twenty-acre allotment, lying in Sharks Valley. It joined on the north to part of the twenty acres allotted to Thomas Francombe described above, and on the south to land of Benjamin Seale. These ten acres now remained in the possession of William Rhoads. Benjamin Seale held a lot in Sharks Valley, joined on the north to William Rhoads. William Bishop held land formerly part of the lot of Richard Leach, lying in Deep Valley. It bordered Deep Valley Ridge on the east and Powells Valley Ridge on the west. Leach exchanged these ten acres with William Bishop, in whose possession the land now lay. Richard Leach held land formerly allotted to William Bishop, lying in Fishers Valley. It bordered William Fox the younger on the east and twenty acres allotted to Thomas Burnham on the west. Bishop exchanged these twenty acres with Leach, in whose possession the land now lay. Leach also held a further part of his original allotment, which he had received in right of his wife, lying in Deep Valley. It joined on the north to William Bishop, and on the south to the company's land in Deep Valley. Thomas Pledger held a lot in Chapel Valley, joined on the east to twenty acres formerly allotted to William Haunt, and on the west to part of twenty acres formerly allotted to John Row. Carried over. Interpretations The phrase which he had for his wife, applied to Richard Leach's holding in Deep Valley, shows that land could enter a household through marriage and be registered to the husband on that basis. The jury recorded the route by which the land had come into his hands, since the legitimacy of his title depended on that connection. Married women's property rights on the island operated through the husband's name in the record, but the source of the entitlement was preserved in writing. The references to company land in Deep Valley reveal that the East India Company retained tracts in its own hands alongside the allotted plots. Settler holdings were defined partly by reference to this retained land, which acted as a fixed boundary. The company was therefore both the granting authority and a continuing landholder in its own right, and the two roles met at the edges of the private allotments. The pattern of exchange between Bishop and Leach, with each taking land in a different valley, points to a mechanism by which holders consolidated their interests in particular districts. An exchange of this kind did not change the total acreage held by either party but moved each closer to a coherent block of land. The jury recorded both sides of the exchange as separate entries, preserving the original allotment identity of each plot. The naming of Black Slewer as the holder of a twenty-acre allotment adjoining Owen Ockwin's land suggests that the register did not confine itself to settlers of European origin. The name reads as a descriptive byname rather than a formal surname, which raises the question of how the jury identified and recorded holders who did not use standard English naming conventions, while still treating them as registered landholders for the purpose of boundary description. |

This produced a denser web of small plots than a household-based distribution would have done. Speculations The repeated appearance of Fishers Valley as the location of several adjacent plots, with chains of sale moving land from original allottees such as Birch, Griffong and Bishop into the hands of later holders like Ockwin, Goodale and Leach, suggests that this valley had become a focus of active dealing by 1682. Land there was perhaps more workable or better watered than parcels elsewhere on the island, drawing buyers willing to pay for established plots rather than take up unallotted ground. The exchange between Bishop and Leach, which moved Bishop into Deep Valley and Leach into Fishers Valley, looks like a coordinated swap rather than two unrelated transactions. Each man took land in a valley where he already had an interest, with Leach building up his Deep Valley holding alongside the land received through his wife. The arrangement points to a deliberate matching of interests between the two men.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

Long sold ten acres of this twenty-acre allotment to Cleverlee. He exchanged the other ten acres with William Price, who in turn exchanged them with Cleverlee, so that the whole twenty acres now lay in Cleverlee's possession. The acreage was 20. A further ten acres were part of Cleverlee's own lot, lying in Sandy Bay, bordering the Main Ridge on the north and Pigeons Rock on the south. The acreage was 10. Sub-total: 30 acres. Francis Steward held land formerly part of John Cleverlee's lot, lying alongside the ten acres described above. It bordered the Main Ridge on the north and Pigeon Rock on the south. Cleverlee sold these ten acres to Steward, in whose possession the land now lay. Carried over. Interpretations The running tally of 450 acres carried over from the previous portion of the register, with sub-totals of 30 acres recorded against grouped entries, shows that the jury kept a continuous count of registered land as it worked through the inquest. The figure served as a check on the total acreage accounted for, allowing the company to verify how much of its granted land was now traced to identifiable holders. The marginal arithmetic was therefore an audit device, not a decorative feature. The repeated phrase which he had for his wife, used here of Daniel [...]ellens as it was earlier of Richard Leach, confirms that this was a standard formula in the register for marking land that had entered a household through marriage. The jury treated such land as part of the husband's registered estate but preserved the route of acquisition in writing, so that any later dispute about the origin of the title could be settled by reference to the record. The chain through which John Cleverlee assembled the whole of John Long's twenty acres, by buying half and acquiring the other half through an exchange with William Price who had himself exchanged with Long, shows that multi-party arrangements were used to bring fragmented parcels under a single holder. The jury followed each link, recording Price's intervening role even though he ended with no land from that transaction. The procedure made every step legally visible and prevented later claims by intermediate parties. The reference to the Stuts as a boundary feature, used here against William Bowman's land in Saine Valley and earlier against William Hayre's lot, indicates that the term identified a named tract of ground recognised across the island rather than a single private holding. Boundaries of this kind anchored the register to the physical landscape, alongside named ridges, valleys, peaks and rocks. The appearance of two Boxes, with Thomas Box holding both his original twenty-acre allotment and the adjoining ten acres formerly held by Henry Webley, illustrates the same consolidation pattern seen earlier with Captain Beale. A holder who acquired a neighbouring parcel from a former allottee produced a single working block of thirty acres without disturbing the underlying record of two distinct grants. Speculations The concentration of dealings around John Cleverlee's holding in Sandy Bay, with Long, Price and Steward all involved in the movement of parcels into and out of his hands, suggests that Cleverlee was actively managing his estate rather than passively accumulating land. He took the whole of Long's twenty acres into his possession but then released ten acres of his own original lot to Steward, which points to a deliberate reshaping of his holding rather than simple |

The exchange with Price, who ended without land from the transaction, looks like a brokered arrangement that allowed Long to dispose of his second ten acres without dealing directly with Cleverlee a second time. The exchange between William Hunt and William Marsh, which moved Hunt's Chapel Valley land into Marsh's hands, fits the pattern seen elsewhere in the register of holders trading parcels to match their working interests. Marsh's acquisition placed him adjacent to Thomas Pledger on one side and the East Ridge on the other, giving him a defined block bounded by a fixed landscape feature. The exchange was perhaps undertaken to secure that bounded position rather than to gain acreage for its own sake.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

One ten-acre half passed through Harding, Goodale, Webley, Steward and Bolton, while the other half passed through Harding, Steward, Fuller and Webley. The two parts ended back in the hands of two adjacent holders, Bolton and Webley, with each parcel having moved through four or five owners. The jury's task was to follow each link in order, since the legitimacy of the current holder rested on an unbroken chain of recorded transfers from the original allottee. The procedure made the register a working title-trace tool, not merely a static list. Mr John Wynn appears repeatedly as an intermediate purchaser who acquired land by exchange or sale and then passed it on, here to Charlesworth and to Cole, as he did earlier in the case of the Walls allotment that came to the Barrington household. His role looks like that of a working broker in the island's land market, taking parcels from original allottees and placing them with settled buyers. The courtesy title Mr, consistently attached to his name, marks his social standing above the unranked planters in the register. The boundary descriptions involving Main Ridge, Dry Gult, Peak Gult and Lemon Valley, used here to define multiple plots, confirm that the jury worked from a shared topographic vocabulary in which named ridges, gullies and valleys served as fixed reference points. The system allowed plots to be located precisely without survey instruments, by reference to features that every islander could identify on the ground. The phrase the company, used as a boundary against Robert Tomps's land in Sarahs Valley, again signals that the East India Company held its own retained tracts alongside the granted allotments. The retained land was treated like any other neighbouring holding for the purposes of boundary description, even though its legal status was different. Speculations The repeated involvement of Francis Steward in the Harding chain, taking ten acres from Harding by exchange and selling them on to Fuller, while at the same time appearing elsewhere in the register as the buyer of land from Cleverlee in Sandy Bay, suggests that Steward was active as a dealer rather than a settled cultivator on any single plot. His pattern of acquiring and quickly transferring land points to short-term holding for resale, with the Fryer Valley parcel passing through his hands without lingering there. Josiah Charlesworth's consolidation of forty acres in Chapel Valley, by taking the Sherwin-adjacent twenty acres and adding the Barrington twenty acres that had moved through Wynn, looks like a deliberate build-up of a single working estate in that valley. The Barrington parcel had been disposed of by Nathaniel Barrington before his death, since it left his hands by exchange to Wynn and then by sale to Charlesworth, while the remaining Barrington holding stayed with his widow Mary as recorded earlier in the register. The family appears to have divided its land between an outright sale and a retained widow's portion, perhaps to raise cash from one parcel while preserving the other for the household. |

The jury recorded the full history of each parcel under her name, treating her as the legal successor to her husband's accumulated estate. This treatment matches the earlier entry for Mary Barrington and confirms that widows on the island took their late husbands' |

The jury recorded the marriage itself as the operative mechanism of transfer, since the land moved with the widow into her new husband's name. The phrase by his marrying with the widow appears as a formal legal entry, indicating that this was an established and registered mode of title. The chain of ten acres passing from Webley to Goodale to Stevens to Hunt to Harding, ending in Sarah Harding's hands, illustrates the depth of secondary dealing on the island by 1682. The same parcel had moved through five registered holders before settling with the widow of the last purchaser. The register's value as a title document depended on its ability to follow such chains accurately, since any break in the recorded sequence would have called the current holder's title into question. The repeated phrase which he had for his wife, applied here to both John Duffield and John Hemmons in adjoining Pleasant Valley parcels, suggests that the original allotment scheme distributed land to married men in right of their wives as well as in their own right. Two adjacent ten-acre parcels both entered the register through this route and both later left their original holders' hands by exchange with the same buyer, Henry Coales. The courtesy title Mr attached to Robert Swallow, used here as a boundary against John Stech's Chapel Valley land, places Swallow in the same social rank as Mr John Wynn and Mr Francis Moore, distinguishing them from the unranked planters who form the bulk of the register. Speculations Henry Coales acquired two adjacent ten-acre parcels in Pleasant Valley by separate exchanges with Duffield and Hemmons, both of whom had received their land in right of their wives. The matching pattern of acquisition, taking two contiguous parcels of identical size from two holders whose titles ran through the same legal route, suggests that Coales was deliberately assembling a twenty-acre working block in Pleasant Valley. The two exchanges look coordinated rather than coincidental, perhaps arranged at the same time to produce a single bounded holding. Henry Francis's three ten-acre parcels, each acquired by a different mechanism, point to an opportunistic build-up rather than a planned consolidation. The marriage to Wrangham's widow brought him the first parcel, an indirect exchange through James Follens brought him the second, and a direct exchange with Fowning brought him the third. The parcels lay in different parts of Chapel Valley and the Peak Gult area, which suggests Francis was taking land where it became available rather than securing a contiguous block. John Stech's combination of a twenty-acre Chapel Valley lot, a ten-acre Sandy Bay parcel from his own original allotment and a further ten-acre Chapel Valley parcel bought from Duffield indicates that he was building a holding spread across two distinct districts of the island. The Sandy Bay parcel, lying between the Main Ridge and the sea, would have served different agricultural or practical purposes from the Chapel Valley land, and Stech may have valued the dual location for the range of uses it offered. |

It joined on the north to the East Ridge and on the south to a further forty acres formerly part of Miller's lot. Miller sold these ten acres to Allis, in whose possession the land now lay. The acreage was 10. Allis also held his own lot in Deep Valley, joined on the north to Isaac Leach and on the south to land formerly held by John Poole. The acreage was 10. Sub-total: 20 acres. In all: 1,090 acres. Interpretations The closing figure of 1,090 acres, marked in all, brings the inquest's running tally to a definitive total for this section of the register. The jury's task culminated in this audited sum, which gave the company a verified measure of allotted land traced to identifiable holders. The running carriage of sub-totals through 450, 650, 800, 940 and 1,090 acres shows that the audit was built up incrementally as each cluster of entries was settled, with the final figure standing as the certified outcome of the work. The chain by which the Crosbey parcel reached William Price moved through four registered holders, with Cleverlee again appearing as an intermediate purchaser. This is the third Sandy Bay parcel in which Cleverlee figures, alongside his consolidation of the Long allotment and his sale to Steward recorded earlier. His repeated presence as a dealer who acquired land and passed it on points to a sustained commercial role in the Sandy Bay market for land, rather than the one-off transactions typical of most planters in the register. The presence of two Swallows, Mr Robert Swallow as the courtesy-titled holder of one Sandy Bay parcel and Thomas Swallow as the unranked holder of the adjoining lot, mirrors the Fox pattern seen earlier in which a senior and a junior member of the same family both held land in their own right. The social distinction marked by Mr applied within the family as well as between families, separating Robert's standing from that of his kinsman Thomas. The reference to Black Oliver as the northern boundary of William Fox the younger's land in Fishers Valley, following Black Slewer in the earlier section, indicates that the register included two holders identified by descriptive bynames built on the same prefix. The jury treated these holders in the same way as |

He had earlier consolidated the Long allotment into his own hands, but in these later transactions he moved land through his possession rather than retaining it. The pattern points to a shift, or perhaps a parallel activity, in which Cleverlee acted as a broker who placed parcels with settled buyers such as Price and Lawson rather than expanding his own estate further. Lawrence Lawson's acquisition of the Phillips twenty acres through Cleverlee placed him next to Andrew Wilson's holding on the west, with the bay forming the eastern boundary. The land was perhaps sought for its coastal frontage as much as for its acreage, since a Sandy Bay parcel with direct access to the shore would have offered uses unavailable to inland plots. Lawson's purchase of an already-traded parcel, rather than an original allotment, indicates that prime Sandy Bay land was no longer available in first grant by 1682 and had to be acquired through the secondary market.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |

The land had been the allotment of William Bishop and his wife, both since died. Bishop exchanged the parcel with Richard Leach, free planter, since died, who sold it to Hemon, in whose possession the land now lay. The acreage was 20. Hemon also held a house standing in Chapel Valley. He had bought it from Governor Helens, since died, who had bought it from Robert Degarney, free planter. George Dweight, soldier, held ten acres of land in Sharks Valley, joined to the lands of John Mudge, free planter, and Sarah Sensney. The land had belonged to Edward Gardener, since died, who gave it to William Marsh, free planter, for the use of his son Robert. Marsh sold the land to Dweight, in whose possession it now lay. The acreage was 10. Island of St Helena. Sarah Sensney of the island made known by these presents that she granted leave to her father in law George Dweight, soldier, to draw water from her land into the watercourse he used, and to carry that water above the upper part of his ground for his own benefit. She bound herself, her heirs, executors and assigns to Henry Modlees, and bound him in turn to Dweight, his heirs, executors and assigns, with respect to the benefit of the watercourse. She set her hand and seal to the document on 13 March 1703. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Jonathan Hegham, who made his mark, and Matthew Bazett, who made his mark. Sarah Sensney made her mark in the form of an X. A seal was attached. A true copy by John Alexander. Interpretations The distinction between corporal, soldier and free planter, applied here to Hemon, Dweight and the various former holders, shows that the register separated landholders by their relationship to the garrison. The free planter category identified civilian settlers who held land in their own right, while the military ranks marked men who held land alongside their service obligations. The categories were carried in |

Gardener gave the land to William Marsh expressly for the use of his son Robert, which is the language of a trust or use rather than an outright gift. Marsh held the legal title but the beneficial interest belonged to Robert. The later sale by Marsh to Dweight raises questions about whether the beneficial interest was extinguished, transferred or compensated, since the register treats the sale as effective without addressing Robert's position. The watercourse grant from Sarah Sensney to her father in law George Dweight is a separate legal instrument that reveals how water rights operated alongside land titles on the island. Land alone did not carry an automatic right to water, and a planter who needed to draw water across or from a neighbour's ground required a formal grant. The instrument was drafted as a binding conveyance, with the grantor binding her heirs, executors and assigns to honour the right in perpetuity, which gave the grant the same durability as a freehold interest. The intermediate figure of Henry Modlees, named in the watercourse grant as the person to whom Sensney bound herself and who in turn was bound to Dweight, suggests a chain of conveyance routed through a third party rather than a direct grant. The construction may reflect a legal device for securing the right against future challenges, with Modlees acting as a trustee or intermediate covenantor through whom the obligation passed. Sarah Sensney's signature by mark, in the form of an X, alongside the marks of the two witnesses Hegham and Bazett, indicates that none of the three could write their names. The document was nevertheless drafted in formal conveyancing language, witnessed and sealed, and certified as a true copy by John Alexander. The legal effect of the grant did not depend on the literacy of the parties but on the proper execution of the instrument. The phrase father in law, applied to Dweight as the recipient of the grant from Sensney, identifies the family connection that lay behind the arrangement. The grant was made within a household relationship rather than as an arm's length transaction, which explains the language of good causes and considerations rather than a stated monetary payment. Speculations The watercourse grant from Sarah Sensney to George Dweight, made within a father in law relationship and without recorded payment, looks like a family arrangement to support Dweight's working of his Sharks Valley land. His ten acres adjoined Sensney's land directly, and the grant allowed him to carry water above the upper part of his ground for his own benefit. The phrase above part of his ground suggests that the watercourse was needed to irrigate land that lay above the natural flow, which would otherwise have been difficult to water. The grant solved a specific practical problem created by the topography of Dweight's holding. The routing of the watercourse obligation through Henry Modlees, with Sensney bound to Modlees and Modlees bound to Dweight, suggests a deliberate legal structure rather than a casual arrangement. The intermediate covenantor would have provided a check against either party repudiating the grant, since the obligation ran through a third party whose own interest in the watercourse may have been independent. Modlees was perhaps an upstream holder whose cooperation was essential to the flow of water, and the binding language secured his role in the arrangement. |

The register's silence on Robert's position points to a resolution that took place outside the recorded transaction, perhaps within the family, leaving Marsh free to sell as if he held absolutely.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

The buildings stood on the Right Honourable Company's waste lands. The land had been the lot of Robert Orchard, free planter, since died. Orchard sold or exchanged the parcel, together with a further ten acres adjoining it, to Thomas Beurch, since died. Beurch sold the second ten acres to Benjamin Seale, since died, and sold the first ten acres described here to Higham, in whose possession the land now lay. The acreage was 10. 5 May 1703. William Dufton, soldier, held twenty acres of land near the head of Chapel Valley, joined to Grace Bulfon's gumwood land and to the lands of Leonard Stevens. The twenty acres had formerly belonged to one Edward Gay, since died, who was said to have given the land to Robert Marsh, the son of William Marsh. William Marsh, acting on behalf of his son Robert and for his son's use and benefit, sold the twenty acres to Dufton, in whose possession the land now lay. The acreage was 20. Thomas Harper to James Casthope. Thomas Harper, planter of the island of St Helena, made known by these presents that he had received the sum of thirty pounds in island currency from James Casthope, soldier of the same island. He acknowledged full payment of the entire sum and released Casthope from any further claim in respect of it. For this consideration and for other good causes, Harper granted, sold and delivered to Casthope twenty acres of land at the head of Sarahs Valley, joined to the land of John Fuller, with all fruits growing on it and all appurtenances belonging to it. He also granted a dwelling house standing on the land. Casthope was to hold the house and the twenty acres, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns from the date of the document for ever. Harper bound himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns to allow Casthope to hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the premises without lawful hindrance, suit, trouble, eviction or interruption from any person whatsoever. Harper set his hand and seal to the document on 27 March 1694. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of James Casthongs and George Hoskinson. Thomas Harper. Interpretations The reference to the Right Honourable Company's waste lands, against which Jonathan Higham's buildings stood, identifies a category of land that the East India Company retained as unallotted and unimproved. The phrase waste was a technical term for ground not yet brought into cultivation or granted to a settler, and the company's continuing ownership of such land bordered private holdings throughout the island. Higham's buildings stood on this retained ground rather than on his own ten acres, which raises a separate question of tenure for the buildings as distinct from the land beneath them. The Orchard allotment in Sharks Valley shows another instance of a single twenty-acre grant split into two ten-acre parcels and sold to different buyers. Beurch acquired the whole from Orchard, sold one half |

The chain demonstrates how original allotments were broken up in the secondary market to suit the working needs of incoming buyers, with intermediate holders like Beurch acting as the agents of subdivision. The Edward Gay parcel illustrates the same trust-style mechanism seen earlier in the Gardener gift. Gay gave the twenty acres to Robert Marsh, with his father William Marsh acting on his behalf. William Marsh then sold the land to Dufton, expressly in his son's name and for his son's benefit. The phrasing here is more careful than in the Gardener entry, since it states that the sale was made for the use and benefit of Robert, which preserves the beneficial interest in the proceeds rather than simply transferring the land out of the trust without acknowledgement. The conveyance from Thomas Harper to James Casthope is a full freehold deed in formal English conveyancing style, drafted to give Casthope a clear and defensible title. The phrase be the same more or less, applied to the twenty acres, recognises that the recorded acreage was an approximation rather than a surveyed measurement. The price of £30 0s 0d in island currency provides a benchmark for the value of a twenty-acre Sarahs Valley parcel with a dwelling house in 1694. The covenant for quiet enjoyment, by which Harper bound himself and his successors against any lawful let, suit, trouble, eviction or interruption to Casthope's possession, was the standard protection in freehold conveyancing. The clause shifted the risk of defective title from the buyer to the seller and gave Casthope a legal remedy against Harper or his heirs if anyone with a prior claim later challenged the holding. The naming of James Casthope as a soldier in the conveyance, alongside Harper's description as a planter, marks the same garrison-civilian distinction seen in the earlier entries. A serving soldier could acquire freehold land in the island's market on the same terms as a civilian planter, with the rank carried in the record for identification rather than affecting the legal substance of the transaction. Speculations The sale of Edward Gay's twenty acres by William Marsh, acting for his son Robert, follows the same pattern as the earlier disposal of the Gardener ten acres. Robert appears in two separate entries as the beneficial owner of land that his father sold on his behalf, in each case to a different purchaser. Robert was perhaps a minor or otherwise unable to act in his own name, with his father exercising the legal capacity to transact on his behalf. The repeated structure suggests an established family practice for managing Robert's interests, with William Marsh holding the legal title in trust and converting land into proceeds as circumstances required. Jonathan Higham's choice to build on the company's waste land adjacent to his own ten acres rather than on the ten acres themselves points to a practical decision about the working of the parcel. He may have valued the additional space without the cost of acquiring further title, or the topography of his own land may have made building difficult. The arrangement carried the risk that the company could reclaim the waste ground at any time, which suggests Higham was either confident of continuing tolerance or willing to accept a structure that he could not defend at law. The price of £30 0s 0d that Casthope paid Harper for twenty acres at the head of Sarahs Valley, together with a dwelling house, provides a useful market benchmark for the period. The figure equates to thirty shillings an acre with the house thrown in, or rather less per acre if the house carried significant value. The relatively modest sum points to a working agricultural |

Gurling conveyed the land to Carne, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and bound himself and his successors to allow Carne and his heirs to hold and enjoy the land peaceably and without disturbance thereafter. He quit all his right and title to the parcel. He signed the document on 5 May 1704. Richard Gurling.George Carne to Ellinor Keeling. George Carne freely and absolutely gave the above-mentioned land to his daughter in law Ellinor Keeling, to her and her heirs for ever. She declared that they had been done without her knowledge and consent. She made this declaration so that the documents above should do no harm or prejudice to her children's lawful right to the ground described in them. Margaret Fagnald.Island of St Helena. John Young to Thomas Goodwin. John Young of the island of St Helena, soldier, addressed all Christian people who might come to see the document and sent greeting in the Lord God everlasting. He acknowledged that he had received from Thomas Goodwin the sum of £3 0s 0d in lawful current money of the island, in full payment and to his complete satisfaction. He released Goodwin, his heirs, executors and administrators from any further claim in respect of the sum. He gave, granted, enfeoffed and confirmed to Goodwin, his heirs and assigns, one parcel of land, said to be of larger measure, lying on the island at the head of the Little Horsepad. The parcel was part of the lot land of James Wakefield, since died, which had been purchased by Young's father John Young, since died, as the bounds were set forth and well known. The parcel comprised eight acres, with the other two acres of the original ten having been purchased by Edward Crosbey. The eight acres lay in Young's own possession and occupation at the time of the conveyance. Goodwin was to hold the land, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs and assigns for ever, to be held of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly done and customarily owed. Young bound himself, his heirs and assigns to defend the title against any challenge. He set his hand and seal to the document on 24 May 1693. John Young made his mark in the form of a W.Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Edward Bless, Edward Crosbey, John Bagley and Daniel Griffeth. A true copy of the original by the clerk of the council. Interpretations The conveyance from Gurling to Carne, followed within twelve days by Carne's gift of the same parcel to his daughter in law Ellinor Keeling, shows how a small urban or near-urban plot could move twice in quick succession through the registered title system. The parcel was identified by frontage measurement (sixteen and a half feet in breadth) rather than by acreage, which |

The location behind Mrs Margaret Fagnald's house places it in a developed area where land was measured by linear dimensions, in contrast to the rural allotments measured in tens and twenties of acres. Margaret Fagnald's protest, entered into the register on 16 February 1703, demonstrates that the recording system allowed an interested party to formally object to a transaction without immediately litigating it. She declared that the sale and gift had taken place without her knowledge and consent, and she entered her declaration to preserve her children's rights against any later use of the documents. The procedure reserved her position without halting the transactions, putting any later purchaser on notice of the dispute. The date sequence raises a difficulty that the register itself does not resolve. Gurling's conveyance to Carne is dated 5 May 1704 and Carne's gift to Keeling is dated 17 May 1704, while Fagnald's protest is dated 16 February 1703 (which on the modern calendar is 16 February 1704, since the year on the island began on 25 March). The protest is therefore dated before the conveyances it complains of, which suggests either that the register has gathered related entries together out of strict chronological order, or that Fagnald's protest was directed at earlier draft instruments that were later formally executed in May. The role of Margaret Fagnald as widow and guardian of her children shows that a widow's authority extended to protecting her children's inheritance interests in land. Her status as guardian was formally recognised in the protest she registered, and her declaration was treated as a record entry in its own right. The case parallels the earlier treatment of Mary Barrington and Sarah Harding as widows holding land in their own names, while adding the further dimension of guardianship over minor children's beneficial interests. The conveyance from Young to Goodwin uses the full medieval English language of feoffment, with the parcel granted, enfeofed and confirmed to be held of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly done and customarily owed. The phrase reproduces a tenorial formula by then almost vestigial in England but carried into St Helena conveyancing practice as a marker of formal freehold transfer. The chief lords of the fee in this context would have been the East India Company as the ultimate landholder of the island, although the formula was used without identifying the recipient of any continuing services. The price of £3 0s 0d that Goodwin paid Young for eight acres at the head of the Little Horsepad gives a per-acre figure of about seven shillings and sixpence, far below the implied rate of the Harper to Casthope conveyance of 1694. The difference perhaps reflects the absence of a dwelling house on the Goodwin parcel, the more remote upland location, or the fact that the land formed only part of a former ten-acre lot whose other two acres had gone to Edward Crosbey. The Wakefield lot's division between Young senior, who bought eight acres, and Edward Crosbey, who bought the remaining two acres, illustrates again how original ten-acre allotments were split between buyers in the secondary market. James Wakefield appears in the earlier 1682 register as a buyer who took parcels in Lemon Valley from Milbank and Ferrant and resold them to Boyce, and his name surfaces here as the original holder of the lot that supplied Young senior's land. The parcel had passed from Wakefield's estate to Young senior and then by inheritance to Young junior, who as a soldier on the island sold it on to Goodwin. The witnessing of Young's conveyance by Edward Crosbey, who held the other two acres of the same original Wakefield lot, points to the close-knit nature of |

Crosbey's signature would have given the conveyance particular weight, since as the holder of the adjacent parcel he was best placed to confirm the bounds of the land sold. Speculations The timing of Carne's gift to Ellinor Keeling, twelve days after his purchase from Gurling, suggests that the acquisition was made with the onward gift already in mind. Carne may have stepped in to buy the parcel from Gurling specifically in order to provide for his daughter in law, with the brief intermediate ownership serving only to clear the title through his own hands before passing it to her. The arrangement avoided a direct sale from Gurling to Keeling and gave Carne control over the terms of her acquisition. Margaret Fagnald's protest perhaps reflects a dispute about the boundary of the parcel sold rather than the existence of the sale itself. The land lay behind her house and was identified by frontage measurement, which would have made the precise extent of the plot a matter of practical importance for her continued use of her own property. Her concern to protect her children's lawful right to the ground points to a claim that some portion of the parcel sold properly belonged to her children's inheritance from her former husband. John Young's sale of his inherited Little Horsepad land to Thomas Goodwin in 1693, while he was serving as a soldier on the island, fits a pattern by which garrison men converted inherited land into cash. Young senior had bought the eight acres during his lifetime, and Young junior's decision to sell rather than work the land suggests that his military service made cultivation impractical. The modest price of £3 0s 0d, against a holding that lay in his own possession and occupation, indicates that he was content to take what the market offered for a parcel he could not manage himself. |

He acknowledged that he had received from Thomas Goodwin, deputy storekeeper of the island, the sum of £11 0s 0d in lawful current money of the island, in full payment and to his complete satisfaction. He released Goodwin, his heirs, executors and administrators from any further claim in respect of the sum. He gave, granted, enfeoffed and confirmed to Goodwin, his heirs and assigns, one parcel of land near the head of Fryer Valley, containing ten acres. The land had formerly been part of the allotment of his father John Coles, since died. It was bounded on the west by lands then held by Thomas Alleson, planter, on the south and east by the remaining part of his father's lot still in his own possession, and on the north by land formerly held by Thomas Bolton, planter, since died. The bounds were set out and well known. The ten acres lay in Coles's own occupation at the time of the conveyance. Goodwin was to hold the land, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs and assigns for ever, to be held of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly done and customarily owed. Coles bound himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns to warrant and defend the title against all other men. He set his hand and seal to the document on 26 March 1696. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Anne Coles, James Duffe and Thomas Alleson. A true copy of the original by Daniel Griffeth, clerk of the council. John Coles, with a seal attached. Interpretations The description of Thomas Goodwin as deputy storekeeper places him within the East India Company's administrative establishment on the island. |                    |                 | assignes, And against all other Men Do Warrant and for Ever Defend by these presents, In Wittness whereof I the aforesaid John Coles, To this my present Writeing have putt to my hand and Seale Dated the 26[th] Day of March 1696 Signed Sealed and Delivered in the presence of us Anne Coles James Du[ffe] Thomas Alleson Vera Copea Pregonall [p]me Doncel Griffeth Clke Councell John Coles [seal] | storekeeper was the officer responsible for managing the company's stocks of goods, provisions and stores, and the deputy held the post under him. Goodwin's appearance here as a buyer of freehold land, alongside his earlier purchase of the Wakefield parcel from John Young, shows that company officials accumulated private holdings on the island while serving in their administrative roles. The title was carried in the conveyance because it identified Goodwin's standing and capacity to transact. The price of £11 0s 0d for ten acres at the head of Fryer Valley gives a per-acre figure of £1 2s 0d, well above the rate implicit in Young's sale to Goodwin of eight acres for £3 0s 0d three years earlier. The difference points to the variable quality of land on the island, with Fryer Valley parcels commanding significantly higher prices than the Little Horsepad upland. The price also reflects that the ten acres formed part of an established lot adjoining the seller's remaining holding, rather than an isolated upland fragment. The bounds of the parcel are described entirely by reference to neighbouring holders, present and former, rather than by physical features such as ridges, streams or peaks. This contrasts with the 1682 register, which routinely used named topographic features as boundary markers. The shift suggests that by the 1690s the network of established holdings had become dense enough to serve as its own reference system, with each parcel anchored by reference to its identified neighbours rather than the underlying landscape. The retention by John Coles of the remaining part of his father's lot, lying to the south and east of the parcel sold, shows the deliberate splitting of an inherited allotment between cash and continued holding. Coles converted ten acres into money while keeping the rest of his father's land in his own occupation. The transaction balanced the immediate need for funds against the long-term value of the family holding. The witnessing of the conveyance by Anne Coles, alongside James Duffe and Thomas Alleson, indicates that a female relative of the seller participated formally in the registered transaction. Anne Coles was probably his wife, sister or daughter, and her signature as witness gave the conveyance additional weight within the family. The earlier conveyance from Young to Goodwin had been witnessed by Edward Crosbey, the holder of the adjoining parcel, and the same pattern appears here with Thomas Alleson, whose land bounded the parcel sold on the west. The presence of an adjoining holder as witness gave authoritative confirmation of the recorded bounds. The warranty by which Coles bound himself and his successors to defend the title against all other men provides Goodwin with the same protection that Casthope had received from Harper in the 1694 conveyance. The clause was a standard element of formal freehold transfer on the island, transferring the risk of any defect in title from the buyer to the seller's estate. Speculations Thomas Goodwin's pattern of acquisition, taking the eight-acre Young parcel at the head of the Little Horsepad in 1693 and the ten-acre Coles parcel near the head of Fryer Valley in 1696, suggests a deliberate strategy of building up a private estate through purchases from men under pressure to sell. Young was a soldier with inherited land he could not manage, and Coles had inherited a divided lot from his late father. Goodwin was perhaps in a position, through his role as deputy storekeeper, to identify and approach holders likely to sell, and his official salary gave him the means to pay. The £11 0s 0d he paid Coles, more than three times the £3 0s 0d Young had received, indicates that |

The land lay between Alleson on the west, Coles's continued holding on the south and east, and the former Bolton land on the north, all of which had been in active cultivation. A parcel surrounded by working neighbours carried less risk than an isolated upland plot and offered the buyer immediate integration into the surrounding pattern of cultivation. John Coles's decision to sell to the company's deputy storekeeper rather than to a neighbouring planter such as Alleson may have been driven by the certainty of payment that an officeholder could offer. A planter buyer would have needed to raise the £11 0s 0d through the disposal of crops or stock, while Goodwin could pay from his accumulated cash. The transaction therefore represents one channel by which company salaries fed into the island's private land market, with administrative officers acting as ready buyers for parcels offered for sale.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

He acknowledged that he had received from Thomas Goodwin the sum of £6 0s 0d in lawful current money of the island, in full payment and to his complete satisfaction. He released Goodwin, his heirs, executors and administrators from any further claim in respect of the sum. He gave, granted, enfeoffed and confirmed to Goodwin, his heirs and assigns, one parcel of land on the side of the Little Horse Pasture. The land was part of the lot of James Wakefield, since died, and its bounds were well known. The parcel comprised two acres, being part of the ten acres that John Young, since died, had bought from Wakefield. The other eight acres had recently been bought by Goodwin from John Young, son and heir of the elder John Young. Goodwin was to hold the two acres, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs and assigns for ever, to be held of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly done and customarily owed. Crosbey bound himself, his heirs and assigns to warrant and defend the title. He set his hand and seal to the document on 19 March 1695. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Rippon Wells and John Alexander. A true copy by Daniel Griffeth, clerk of the council. Edward Crosbey, with a seal attached. William Fox to Thomas Harper. William Fox, planter of the island of St Helena, made known by these presents that he had received the sum of £25 0s 0d in current money of the island from Thomas Harper, planter of the same island. He acknowledged full payment and released Harper from any further claim. For this consideration and for other good causes, Fox granted, sold and delivered to Harper twenty acres of land at the head of Sarahs Valley, joined to the land of Owen Bevan, with all fruits growing on it and all appurtenances belonging to it. He also granted a dwelling house standing on the land. Harper was to hold the twenty acres and the house, with all appurtenances. Interpretations The Crosbey conveyance closes the record of how the original ten-acre Wakefield parcel at the Little Horse Pasture came into Thomas Goodwin's hands. Goodwin had bought the eight acres from John Young the younger in May 1693 and now took the remaining two acres from Crosbey on 19 March 1695. The two |

The disparity in price per acre, with the two-acre parcel costing twice as much as the eight, indicates that the two parcels carried very different valuations despite forming parts of the same original lot. The conveyance date of 19 March 1695, falling before 25 March in the old calendar, would have been written by the parties at the time as 19 March 1694 according to the year then current on the island. The document records the date in the dual form 169 <math>\frac{1}{2}</math> to acknowledge both reckonings, with 1694 as the year then ending and 1695 as the year just about to begin. The dual dating reflects the calendar practice by which the new year began on Lady Day, 25 March, six days after the conveyance was executed. The price of £25 0s 0d that Harper paid Fox for twenty acres at the head of Sarahs Valley, with a dwelling house, gives a per-acre figure of twenty-five shillings, close to the rate at which Casthope had paid Harper £30 0s 0d for a similar twenty-acre parcel with a house in March 1694. The two prices establish a consistent valuation for upper Sarahs Valley land of this size and improvement in the mid-1690s. Harper himself moves between the role of seller in the Casthope transaction and buyer in the Fox transaction, accumulating land in the same valley district while disposing of holdings to others within it. The recurrence of the formula be the same more or less, applied here to the twenty acres conveyed by Fox to Harper as it was in the Harper to Casthope deed, confirms the phrase as a standard element of the island's conveyancing language. The clause protected the seller against a later claim that the parcel fell short of its recorded acreage, since the buyer accepted the land as identified by its bounds rather than by precise measurement. The price differential between Goodwin's £6 0s 0d for two acres from Crosbey and the £3 0s 0d he had paid Young for eight acres of the same lot perhaps reflects the position of the two parcels within the original Wakefield holding. Crosbey's two acres may have included the more accessible or workable ground, or may have carried particular features such as water access or building potential that gave them disproportionate value. Without a description of the parcels' relative positions, the precise reason for the disparity cannot be recovered from the document. Speculations Goodwin's reassembly of the Wakefield ten-acre lot by separate purchases from Young and Crosbey, taken two years apart and at very different per-acre prices, suggests that he set out deliberately to bring the original allotment back under single ownership. The pattern fits his earlier acquisition of the Coles parcel in Fryer Valley and reinforces the picture of a company official accumulating private land through opportunistic purchases. The high price he paid Crosbey for the two-acre balance indicates that Crosbey was in a strong negotiating position, perhaps because Goodwin needed the parcel to complete his consolidation and Crosbey knew this. The witnesses to the Crosbey conveyance, Rippon Wells and John Alexander, point to the involvement of identifiable figures in the island's record-keeping. John Alexander appears earlier as the certifier of the Sensney watercourse grant of 1703, and his presence as a witness here suggests a continuing role in the formal execution of conveyances. Rippon Wells's signature on this document brings him into the same network of administrative and legal practitioners through whom the island's land transactions passed. |

He may have sold one parcel and bought another in order to consolidate his holding around a preferred location within Sarahs Valley, or to substitute a more workable parcel for one he found less suitable. The pattern points to active management of his holdings rather than simple accumulation or divestment.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

Fox bound himself and his successors to allow Harper to hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the premises without lawful hindrance, suit, trouble, eviction or interruption from any person whatsoever. Fox set his hand and seal to the document on 30 January 1694. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Casten, John Towning, who made his mark, and William Hopkins. A true copy by Daniel Griffeth, clerk of the council. William Fox made his mark in the form of a W. Thomas Harper to Thomas Goodwin. Thomas Harper, planter of the island of St Helena, addressed all Christian people who might come to see the document and sent greeting in the Lord God everlasting. He acknowledged that he had received from Thomas Goodwin, gunner's mate of the island, the sum of £35 0s 0d in lawful current money of the island, in full payment and to his complete satisfaction. He released Goodwin, his heirs, executors and administrators from any further claim in respect of the sum. He gave, granted, enfeoffed and confirmed to Goodwin, his heirs and assigns, a parcel of land near the Little Horse Pasture at the head of Sarahs Valley, containing twenty acres. The land had formerly been the allotment of Hedalph Elven, since died, who had alienated it by exchange to William Fox the elder, late of the island, planter. Fox sold the parcel to Harper at the going of the island. The land was bounded on the south by the lot lands of Owen Bevan, on the north by the lot lands of Henry Herbey and James Wakefield, then in Goodwin's possession, on the west by the Right Honourable Company's common, and on the east by land formerly held by Thomas Bolton. The bounds were set out and well known. The conveyance also included all provisions growing on the land, except a parcel of yams that had been set aside and reserved for Harper's own use. Harper was obliged to plant the successor crop when he dug those yams, and that successor crop was reserved for the sole use of Goodwin. Interpretations The Fox to Harper conveyance is dated 30 January 1694 in modern reckoning, having fallen in January before 25 March in the old calendar when the year was then written as 1693. The transaction therefore preceded the Harper to Casthope conveyance of 27 March 1694 by less than two months. Harper bought the Fox twenty acres at the end of January and sold a different twenty-acre parcel to Casthope on the day after Lady Day, which suggests that he was holding more than one Sarahs Valley parcel during this period and disposing of one while acquiring another. The description of Thomas Goodwin as gunner's mate in the Harper to Goodwin conveyance differs |

The change indicates a transfer of post within the company's establishment on the island, with Goodwin having moved from the storekeeping department to the gunnery, or perhaps holding both positions in succession or at different points in his career. The recording of his current title in each conveyance shows that the register tracked the holder's standing at the moment of each transaction rather than assigning a fixed designation. The price of £35 0s 0d that Goodwin paid Harper for the twenty acres at the head of Sarahs Valley represents an increase of £10 0s 0d over the £25 0s 0d that Harper had paid Fox for the same parcel. The mark-up of forty percent reflects either an appreciation in land values during the period Harper held the parcel, the addition of improvements during his occupation, or the inclusion of the standing crop of provisions in the price. The yam clause indicates that growing crops formed part of the transaction's value, with the conveyance carrying not just the freehold but the agricultural produce attached to it. The yam reservation provides an unusual glimpse into the practical mechanics of a land transfer between an outgoing and an incoming holder. Harper kept a specific parcel of yams for his own consumption but bound himself to replant the ground after harvest, with the new crop becoming Goodwin's property. The arrangement preserved Harper's immediate food supply during the transition while ensuring that Goodwin received the land in productive condition. The clause functions as a kind of agricultural handover, embedded within the freehold conveyance. The phrase at the going of the island, used to identify the timing of Fox's earlier sale to Harper, appears to refer to a specific event in the island's history. The expression probably denotes a moment of departure or transition, perhaps connected to a turnover of population, a major sailing of company shipping, or a change of administration. Without further context within the document the precise event cannot be identified, but the phrase is treated by the parties as a known reference point that needed no further explanation. The reference to the Right Honourable Company's common, used as the western boundary of the parcel, identifies another category of retained company land alongside the waste land mentioned in the Higham entry. A common would have been land held for shared use, perhaps for the grazing of livestock or for general access, distinct from the unimproved waste that the company had not yet brought into any productive use. The two terms together show that the company maintained at least two classes of retained land with different intended functions. The bounds described in the conveyance show how Goodwin's holdings on the island had begun to articulate themselves as a connected estate. The Wakefield parcel that he had assembled from Young and Crosbey lay to the north of the Fox parcel he was now acquiring from Harper, and Henry Herbey's lot lay alongside Wakefield's to the same northern side. Goodwin was therefore consolidating a continuous block of land at the head of Sarahs Valley, with the new acquisition extending his holding southwards from the parcels he already owned. The chain of title for the Fox parcel runs from Hedalph Elven, the original allottee, by exchange to William Fox the elder, by sale to Harper at the going of the island, and now by sale to Goodwin. The conveyance records each step in sequence as part of the warrant of title, since Goodwin's security against any later claim depended on the documented history of the parcel back to its first allotment. |

The Fryer Valley parcel stands apart from the others geographically, but the Wakefield and Fox parcels lie adjacent to each other near the head of Sarahs Valley and together formed a continuous block of thirty acres. Goodwin's accumulation was therefore both opportunistic in taking parcels as they came available and deliberate in concentrating his holdings around a chosen district. The forty percent mark-up that Harper achieved on the Fox parcel, from £25 0s 0d to £35 0s 0d in just over two years, suggests that he had improved the land during his occupation or that the inclusion of the standing provision crop added substantial value beyond the bare land and house. The clause reserving the yams indicates that the crop was a significant component of the agricultural economy on the parcel, and Harper's willingness to bind himself to replant for Goodwin's benefit shows that the value of the growing crop was understood by both parties as part of the consideration. The pairing of Harper's January 1694 purchase from Fox with his March 1694 sale to Casthope suggests that Harper may have been engaged in a deliberate substitution of one Sarahs Valley parcel for another. The two transactions stand within a span of less than two months, both involving twenty-acre parcels with houses at the head of Sarahs Valley, at prices of £25 0s 0d and £30 0s 0d respectively. Harper may have preferred the Fox parcel for its specific location, soil, or improvements and used the proceeds from the Casthope sale to fund the Fox acquisition, ending the period with a single working holding in the location of his choice rather than two scattered parcels. |

The phrase to be held of the chief lords of the fee by services formerly due and customarily owed, repeated here as in earlier conveyances, carries forward the medieval English language of tenure into the island's record-keeping. The clause is largely formulaic by 1694 but preserves the technical framework within which the conveyance operated as a legal instrument. The witnessing of the conveyance by Owen Bevan, whose own land bordered the parcel sold on the south, follows the established pattern by which adjoining holders authenticated transactions at the head of Sarahs Valley. Bevan's mark, made in the form of a B, indicates that he was unable to sign his name, although his standing as a recognised neighbouring holder gave his witness particular weight regardless of literacy. The Edmunds to Goodwin conveyance of 10 May 1700 marks a different kind of transaction within Goodwin's pattern of acquisition. The property conveyed is a tenement house in Chapel Valley Town rather than agricultural land, and the price of £130 0s 0d is more than three and a half times what Goodwin paid for any of his earlier parcels. The very different price reflects the urban character of the property, with the house occupying a position in the only settled town on the island and carrying value through location and structure rather than acreage. Chapel Valley Town denotes the principal settlement on the island, the site of the fort and the company's administrative buildings, where merchants, officials and others connected with the company's establishment lived. A house there carried a value that bore no relation to upland farming parcels because its function was residential and commercial rather than agricultural. The use of the term Chapel Valley Town distinguishes the settlement from the wider Chapel Valley district where agricultural lots were also located. The boundary description identifies the house by reference to its neighbouring buildings rather than to topographic features or acreage, with Mrs Grace Coulson's house on one side and Samuel Wranyham's house on the other. The form of description marks the property as a town tenement defined by its position within a row of buildings rather than as a piece of ground measured by area. The title Mrs attached to Grace Coulson places her in the same social rank as the courtesy-titled men encountered earlier in the register and shows that the honorific was applied to women in their own right within the urban record. The use of the formula demised, granted, bargained and sold, rather than the granted, enfeofed and confirmed of the earlier agricultural conveyances, marks a different style of urban conveyancing. The phrase reflects the leasehold and copyhold vocabulary that ran alongside the feoffment formula in English property law and was applied here to a tenement house, although the substance of the transfer was a freehold sale with quit-claim and warranty. The signing of the Edmunds conveyance by his own hand, rather than by mark, shows that he could write his name, in contrast to William Fox and Owen Bevan who appear with marks in the earlier deeds. The witnesses Gabriel Powell, Henry Francis and John Alexander all appear elsewhere in the records, with Henry Francis as a holder of land in Chapel Valley and Peak Gult in the 1682 register and John Alexander as |

The very substantial sum of £130 0s 0d sterling represented a different scale of commitment from his earlier parcels and suggests that he had accumulated capital from his salary, from the income of his agricultural holdings, or from both, that he was now placing into a single high-value urban property. The town house would have offered him a residence within the principal settlement and a base for any commercial activity tied to the company's establishment. The use of pounds sterling in the Edmunds conveyance, in place of the current money of the island used in the earlier agricultural deeds, points to a distinction in the currencies used for different classes of transaction. Urban tenement sales perhaps moved at sterling values reflecting the international standing of the property and its purchaser's resources, while rural land sales continued in island currency that reflected local agricultural conditions. The pricing in sterling indicates that the Chapel Valley Town house was treated as a higher-status asset within the island's property market. The £130 0s 0d price for the Edmunds tenement, set against the £25 0s 0d to £35 0s 0d that Sarahs Valley twenty-acre parcels with houses fetched in the same period, shows that urban property carried roughly four times the value of comparable rural holdings. The disparity reflects the small supply of town houses on the island, the social standing they conferred, and their proximity to the centres of company administration and trade. Goodwin's willingness to pay this premium suggests that he valued the urban location for reasons that went beyond the agricultural return he could obtain from rural land. The Edmunds conveyance is signed by his own hand, in contrast to the marks of Crosby, Fox and Bevan in earlier deeds, which together with the use of sterling currency and the urban location of the property points to a different social stratum within the island's settler population. The town included literate proprietors capable of executing formal documents in their own names, alongside the largely illiterate rural population whose conveyances depended on witnesses to confirm the marks they made. |

The land bordered the Right Honourable Company's waste land on the east and the land of John Nicholls, planter, on the west. The ten acres had been left to Harding by his sister Lydea Harding. French was to hold the land, with all appurtenances, to his own use and benefit for ever, freely and without interruption, with no further money to be paid to Harding or his successors beyond the sum already received. Harding set his hand and seal to the document on 25 July 1691, in the third year of the reign of William and Mary, King and Queen of England, Scotland and elsewhere. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of John Nicholls and John Long. A true copy by Daniel Griffeth, clerk of the council. Richard Harding, with a seal attached. Interpretations The Henry Francis quit-claim of 27 January 1704 functions as a supplementary instrument designed to clear any residual claim that might have arisen against Goodwin's title to the Chapel Valley house bought from Edmunds in May 1700. Francis acted because Edmunds was his father in law, which gave him a possible interest as son in law in any family claim against the property. By formally releasing his right of suit or action, Francis closed off a route through which the title could later have been challenged through his branch of the family. The conveyance reveals how Goodwin secured his urban purchase against latent claims, taking a separate quit-claim from a related party more than three years after the original transaction. The relationship between Henry Francis and Edward Edmunds, identified in the document as father in law to son in law, places both men within a Chapel Valley family network. Francis appears in the 1682 register as a holder of three ten-acre parcels acquired by marriage to Francis Wrangham's widow and by exchanges with Fannely and Fowning. His marriage to Wrangham's widow does not connect him directly to the Edmunds household, so the father in law relationship recorded here points to a separate marriage, probably to a daughter of Edmunds following the widow's death. The appearance of Francis Wrangham as a witness to the quit-claim is striking, since Henry Francis had earlier married the widow of an earlier Francis Wrangham, and this witness is likely a son or descendant of that household. The Richard Harding to William French conveyance of 25 July 1691 provides the earliest dated freehold deed in the records reviewed here. The dating clause, in the third year of the reign of William and Mary, anchors the document to the political settlement of 1689 and shows that island scribes were tracking the regnal years of the joint monarchs as part of formal conveyancing language. The full royal style of King and Queen of England, Scotland and elsewhere appears in abbreviated form but follows the standard English usage of the period. The price of £4 10s 0d for ten acres at the head of Oak Gutt indicates a per-acre figure of nine shillings, slightly higher than the seven shillings and sixpence per acre that John Young's eight-acre parcel at the Little Horsepadd fetched in 1693 but far below the £1 2s 0d per acre that Coles obtained for his Fryer Valley parcel in 1696 or the rates at the head of Sarahs Valley. The figure places upland and gully-head land in a distinctly cheaper category than valley parcels, which fits the general pattern of valuation by location and quality across the island. The route by which the ten acres came to Richard Harding, having been left to him by his sister Lydea |

Lydea Harding had held the land in her own name and bequeathed it to her brother. The recording of her sole ownership and her testamentary disposition demonstrates that single or unmarried women on the island could hold land independently and pass it on at their own discretion. The Harding family thus shows three distinct property routes within its records, with Sarah Harding holding her late husband's accumulated estate as widow, Richard Harding receiving land from his sister Lydea by bequest, and Richard Harding then selling part of it on to French. The phrase no more money to be paid, attached to the conveyance, gives the buyer absolute security against any subsequent demand for additional consideration. The clause confirms that the £4 10s 0d represented the complete and final price, with no instalments, top-ups or residual obligations attached. The form of words is characteristic of a clean freehold sale closing all financial connection between the parties at the moment of conveyance. John Nicholls's appearance both as the western neighbour of the parcel sold and as one of its two witnesses, alongside John Long, mirrors the pattern seen in earlier conveyances where adjoining holders authenticated transactions affecting their boundary. Nicholls is identified in the document by the same designation, planter, that the boundary description applies to him, which removes any ambiguity about his role. Speculations Henry Francis's quit-claim, taken more than three years after Goodwin's purchase from Edmunds, suggests that some specific event or concern between 1700 and January 1704 prompted Goodwin to seek the additional protection. The lapse of time points away from a routine completion of the original transaction and towards a later issue, perhaps Edmunds's death, the marriage of one of his daughters or a family dispute about the proceeds of the sale. The dating of the quit-claim in early 1704, falling within weeks of Margaret Fagnald's protest about the Gurling to Carne transaction in February 1704, points to a period when family claims against urban property in Chapel Valley were being actively contested or pre-empted. The route by which the Oak Gutt ten acres came to Richard Harding through his sister Lydea, followed by his sale to a soldier, perhaps illustrates how inherited land was converted into cash within the island's economy. Lydea Harding's holding may have come to her from an earlier family allotment or by her own bequest from a parent, and her brother's decision to sell rather than work the parcel indicates that he already held sufficient land elsewhere. The Harding family network supported the disposal of an outlying upland parcel to fund other priorities, with the cash from William French moving into the family's wider resources. William French's purchase of the ten acres as a serving soldier follows the pattern seen in James Casthope and George Dweight, where members of the garrison acquired freehold parcels on the island during their military service. The modest sum of £4 10s 0d would have been within reach of a soldier's accumulated pay, and the Oak Gutt location, although remote, gave French a foothold in the island's property-owning class. The transaction reveals how the line between civilian planters and military personnel was crossed by men whose service did not prevent them from establishing private interests in the island's land. |

To Have and | William French of the island of St Helena addressed all Christian people who might come to see the document and sent greeting in the Lord God everlasting. He acknowledged that he had received from Captain Goodwin, deputy governor and storekeeper of the island, the sum of £18 0s 0d in lawful current money of the island, in full payment and to his complete satisfaction. He released Goodwin, his heirs, executors and administrators from any further claim in respect of the sum. He gave, granted, enfeoffed, confirmed and sold to Goodwin, his heirs and assigns, a parcel of land on the side of the High Peak, joined to the lands of John Nicholls and the lot land of Thomas Box, containing ten acres. The land lay in French's own occupation at the time of the conveyance. Goodwin was to hold the ten acres, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs and assigns for ever, to be held of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly done and customarily owed. French bound himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns to warrant and defend the title against all other men. He set his hand and seal to the document on 3 June 1703. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of John French, John Alexander and Matthew Bazett. A true copy by Daniel Griffeth, clerk of the council. William French, with a seal attached. Samuel Jeffery to Henry Kerfey. This indenture, made on 3 November 1683, was between Samuel Jeffrey, free planter of the island of St Helena, of the one part, and Henry Kerfey of the same island, of the other part. Jeffrey acknowledged that he had received the sum of £5 0s 0d in full payment, to his complete satisfaction. For this consideration and for other good causes, he demised, granted, bargained and sold to Kerfey a parcel of land of about ten acres, more or less, lying in Fryer Valley, with bounds as appearing in the register book. The conveyance included the planted crops, the watercourses and all appurtenances belonging to the land. Interpretations The French to Goodwin conveyance of 3 June 1703 records a further stage in Thomas Goodwin's accumulation of land on the island, with French selling on the ten-acre Oak Gutt parcel he had bought from Richard Harding twelve years earlier. The document differs from the earlier description by placing the parcel on the side of the High Peak rather than at the head of Oak Gutt, which suggests that the two locations are alternative ways of identifying the same upland area, with Oak Gutt running on the flank of the High Peak. The boundaries given here, joined to the lands of John Nicholls and the lot land of Thomas Box, confirm that the parcel lay in the same district as the original Harding sale, since Nicholls had been the western neighbour in 1691. The description of Thomas Goodwin in this conveyance as captain, deputy governor and storekeeper marks a substantial elevation from the gunner's mate of 1694 and the deputy storekeeper of 1696. He had risen through the company's hierarchy on the island to become its second-ranking official, combining the deputy governorship with continued responsibility for the storekeeping department. The captaincy attached to his name reflects either military command of part of the garrison or the courtesy military title given to senior company officers. The triple designation in the conveyance shows the consolidated authority he held by 1703. The price of £18 0s 0d that Goodwin paid French represents an increase of £13 10s 0d over the £4 10s 0d that French had paid Harding for the same ten acres in 1691. The mark-up of four times the original price, accumulated over twelve years, reflects either substantial |

The figure also stands well above the seven shillings and sixpence per acre at which Young's Little Horsepad land had moved in 1693, indicating that High Peak side land had appreciated significantly relative to other upland locations. The witnessing of the conveyance by John French, John Alexander and Matthew Bazett brings together names that recur across the records. John Alexander has appeared as a witness or certifier in conveyances of 1695 and 1703, and Matthew Bazett has appeared as a witness to the Sensney watercourse grant of 13 March 1704 and as a neighbouring holder to Jonathan Higham in Sharks Valley. John French is probably a relative of the seller, witnessing the family transaction as next of kin. The Jeffrey to Kerfey indenture of 3 November 1683 records a transaction from the year following the formal landholding inquest of September 1682. The conveyance shows that the registered allotments documented in the inquest were already moving in the secondary market within a year of the survey, with Jeffrey disposing of a ten-acre Fryer Valley parcel to Kerfey. The reference to bounds appearing in the register book makes explicit the dependence of private conveyancing on the official record, with the parties relying on the 1682 inquest to define the precise extent of the land rather than restating the bounds in the deed itself. The price of £5 0s 0d that Kerfey paid Jeffrey for ten acres in Fryer Valley in 1683 provides an early benchmark for the per-acre valuation of valley land. The figure of ten shillings per acre lies above the upland rates seen in later conveyances at Oak Gutt and the Little Horsepad but well below the £1 2s 0d per acre that Coles obtained for his Fryer Valley parcel from Goodwin in 1696. The intervening thirteen years had therefore seen a more than doubling of Fryer Valley land values, with prices moving in step with the wider appreciation of valley parcels across the island. The use of indenture rather than the to all Christian people opening of the later conveyances marks the Jeffrey to Kerfey document as following a different drafting tradition. The indenture form, with parties of the one part and of the other part, derives from the medieval English practice of cutting matching copies of the document along an indented line, with each party retaining a half. The form was used for bilateral agreements between identified parties, in contrast to the to all Christian people address that opened a unilateral grant or feoffment. The inclusion of planted crops and watercourses within the Jeffrey conveyance shows that the standard formula for a Fryer Valley sale extended beyond the bare land to its agricultural and hydraulic improvements. The same approach appears in the yam reservation of the Harper to Goodwin Sarahs Valley conveyance of 1694, where standing crops formed part of the transaction's value. The early 1683 deed and the 1694 deed together show that growing crops and water arrangements were routinely treated as part of the conveyance rather than as separate items. Speculations Thomas Goodwin's continued accumulation of land into 1703, twelve years after his earliest recorded purchase from John Young in 1693, points to a sustained strategy of estate-building that spanned the entire period of his rise within the company's establishment on the island. The promotion to deputy governor and storekeeper would have brought greater income and greater opportunity to identify and approach holders willing to sell, and the French parcel |

By 1703 Goodwin held parcels scattered across Fryer Valley, the Little Horsepad, the head of Sarahs Valley, the Chapel Valley urban tenement and now the side of the High Peak, giving him a diversified estate that combined agricultural land in multiple districts with a town house in the principal settlement. William French's decision to sell after twelve years' ownership suggests that his circumstances had changed in ways that made the upland parcel no longer essential to him. He may have left military service, retired from the island or accumulated other resources that displaced the Oak Gutt land within his interests. The fourfold increase in price between his 1691 purchase and his 1703 sale would have given him a substantial cash return on the original investment, perhaps funding a move within or away from the island. The fact that Goodwin took the French parcel at a price four times what Harding had received from French in 1691 indicates that he was willing to pay a substantial premium to add the parcel to his estate, perhaps because it adjoined or completed a working block already in his possession. The location on the side of the High Peak, joined to land of John Nicholls and the lot of Thomas Box, places it within reach of other upland parcels that Goodwin or his connections may have held, and the price suggests that he valued the consolidation more than he resisted the cost. The Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance of 1683 represents perhaps the earliest surviving private deed in the records reviewed here, falling within thirteen months of the formal inquest of September 1682. The transaction shows that the inquest had not closed off the secondary market in land but had instead provided the documentary foundation on which later conveyances could rest. The reference to the register book within the deed makes explicit what later conveyances took for granted, that the official record was the authoritative source of the bounds and identity of every parcel in private hands. |

The parcel was part of Kersey's lot land. The conveyance included all appurtenances belonging to the land, comprising houses, plantation, provisions, hedges, ditches, walls, water and watercourses. Kersey also conveyed a further ten acres formerly in the occupation of Samuel Jeffrey, planter, with all its appurtenances, as appeared more fully in the deed of grant made to him by Jeffrey. Goodwin was to hold the combined twenty acres, with the houses, provisions and other appurtenances, to himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns from the date of the document for ever, without any hindrance, molestation or eviction. Interpretations The memorandum attached to the Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance, with its penalty of twenty shillings for cutting wood on the ten acres after the sale, reveals that standing timber was treated as a distinct element of the parcel's value. The clause was directed against the seller after the sale, since Jeffrey would no longer have any right to enter the land and remove its timber. The penalty of a single pound, against a sale price of £5 0s 0d, represented twenty percent of the consideration and gave Kersey a meaningful financial protection against an outgoing seller stripping the parcel of its resources. The wording shows that wood on St Helena was a scarce and valued resource by 1683 and that buyers expected explicit protection against its removal. Thomas Goodwin's appearance as a witness to the Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance of 3 November 1683 places him on the island as a literate observer of property transactions a decade before his first recorded purchase from John Young in May 1693. The witness signature shows that Goodwin was already engaged with the island's property dealings during the early 1680s, perhaps in a junior administrative role that brought him into contact with conveyancing work without yet acquiring property in his own right. The arc of his career then runs from witness to purchaser, with the same Fryer Valley parcel passing through Kersey's hands and into his own eight years later. The Kersey to Goodwin conveyance of 1 December 1691 brings together two parcels into a single transaction. Kersey conveyed both a ten-acre portion of his own original lot at the head of Fryer Valley and the ten acres he had bought from Jeffrey in 1683, together with the houses, provisions, hedges, ditches, walls, water and watercourses attached to them. The combined twenty acres adjoined ten acres that Goodwin already possessed at the head of Fryer Valley, although that earlier holding does not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed. The conveyance therefore extended an existing Goodwin holding rather than initiating one. The price of £25 0s 0d that Goodwin paid Kersey for the combined twenty acres in 1691 establishes a per-acre figure of £1 5s 0d, broadly consistent with the £1 2s 0d per acre that Goodwin paid Coles for his Fryer Valley parcel in 1696. The Fryer Valley district therefore maintained a stable per-acre value across the five years between the two transactions, with the combined Kersey holding fetching slightly more than the later Coles parcel because it included a larger range of improvements and the second ten acres recently acquired from Jeffrey. The enumeration of appurtenances in the Kersey to Goodwin deed, listing houses, plantation, provisions, hedges, ditches, walls, water and watercourses, gives a comprehensive picture of what an improved Fryer Valley holding included by 1691. The transaction conveyed not just the bare land but a fully operating agricultural unit ready for continued use by the new holder. The reference to Goodwin's existing ten-acre holding on the south side of the Kersey parcel raises questions about how Goodwin acquired that earlier piece of land. None of the conveyances in the records reviewed identifies the source of this ten-acre Fryer Valley holding, although by December 1691 it was sufficiently established to serve as the southern boundary of the new acquisition. The earlier holding may have come through a deed not included in the records reviewed, through an allotment in his own name, or through a transaction yet to be encountered. The phrase paid or secured to be paid, used in the Kersey to Goodwin conveyance, indicates that the consideration was either delivered in cash at the time of execution or formally guaranteed through a separate instrument. The flexibility of the wording allowed for arrangements in which part of the purchase price might be settled after the conveyance, supported by a bond, mortgage or written undertaking. The clause shows that island property transactions could accommodate credit arrangements alongside outright cash sales. The seller's mark in the Jeffrey conveyance was made in the form of an E rather than the more usual X, and the buyer's mark in the William Fox conveyance was a W. The use of distinctive marks rather than uniform crosses suggests that illiterate planters could and did adopt personal sign forms, often using a letter associated with their own names, to authenticate documents. The practice gave each mark some individual character even where the maker could not write. Speculations Thomas Goodwin's progression from witness in 1683 to substantial Fryer Valley landholder by December 1691 traces a career path within the company's establishment on the island. His presence as a witness in the early 1680s, before any recorded purchase in his own name, suggests that he served first in a position that brought him into contact with the council's clerical and administrative work, gaining the literacy and the connections that later enabled him to act as a purchaser. The role of gunner's mate identified in the 1691 deed represents an intermediate position from which he later rose to deputy storekeeper and ultimately to deputy governor. The combination of two transactions in the single Kersey to Goodwin conveyance of December 1691 perhaps reflects a deliberate decision to consolidate paperwork rather than execute separate deeds for each parcel. Kersey was disposing of his own original ten acres and the ten acres he had bought from Jeffrey eight years earlier, both lying adjacent to Goodwin's existing holding. By packaging the two parcels into a single conveyance, Kersey transferred his entire Fryer Valley interest in one instrument, simplifying his withdrawal from the district and giving Goodwin a single document covering twenty acres of acquired land. The five-fold increase in value attached to the Jeffrey ten acres, from £5 0s 0d when Kersey bought them in 1683 to a contribution within the £25 0s 0d package by which Goodwin took them eight years later, reflects either substantial improvement during Kersey's holding or general appreciation of Fryer Valley land across that period. The 1683 transaction is the earliest recorded sale of the parcel and the 1691 transaction is the next recorded sale, so the rate of appreciation cannot be checked against intermediate values. By 1683 the limited stands of usable wood would have been a recognised resource, with sellers tempted to extract value from a parcel between agreement and physical delivery. The clause shows that buyers and their advisers were sufficiently alert to this risk to insert explicit financial deterrents into the recorded instruments.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

The parcel bordered, on the east, part of twenty acres in the occupation of John Cole. It bordered Lemon Valley Ridge on the west, part of ten acres formerly held by Hedalph on the north, and land in the occupation of Thomas Allison on the south. Bevan was to hold the premises, with his heirs and assigns, for ever, on condition that he and his successors maintain true faith and allegiance to the King, his heirs and successors, and to the company and its successors, and duly obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The governor and company set their common seal to the document at the fort on the island on 19 August 1684. Sealed in the presence of J. He made the transfer for the love, good will and affection he bore to Goodwin. The conveyance was to take effect after the death of both Bevan himself and his beloved wife, with the land then passing to Goodwin, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to the same conditions as the original grant. In the alternative case that Goodwin's eldest son John Goodwin lived and resided on the island, he [...] Interpretations The company deed to Owen Bevan of 19 August 1684 is the first instrument in the records reviewed that takes the form of an original grant from the East India Company rather than a transfer between private parties. The document records the company's role as the ultimate landholder of the island, with authority to allot freehold parcels to settlers on conditions that bound them to the company's authority. The grant was signed by the governor, deputy governor and a councillor, sealed with the company's common seal at the fort, and |

|              |              |                   | entered into the register at folio 27, which together gave it the full weight of a company instrument. The conditions attached to the grant required Bevan and his successors to maintain true faith and allegiance to the king and to the company, and to obey the laws and constitutions of the island. The clause set out a dual loyalty, with the crown named first and the company second, reflecting the legal framework under which the company exercised authority over the island as a chartered body holding under royal grant. The further condition of obedience to island laws made every freeholder subject to the company's local government as a condition of holding land, with implicit forfeiture available if those obligations were breached. The naming of John Blackmore as governor in 1684 places the grant within the administration of that official, who appears in the same document alongside his deputy Robert Holden and the third councillor Gregory Field. The signature of J. Blackmore the younger as register, distinguished from the elder Blackmore who served as governor, suggests a family connection within the company's establishment, with the younger man holding the post responsible for entering grants into the official register. The naming of folio 27 as the location of the entry shows that the register was paginated and that individual grants could be cross-referenced to their place in the book. The boundary description in the Bevan grant identifies adjoining holders by reference to their occupation of neighbouring parcels, with John Cole's twenty acres on the east, Hedalph's former ten acres on the north and Thomas Allison's land on the south. The form of description differs from the private conveyances of the same period in that it uses the company's perspective, with the parcels named as in the occupation of their current holders rather than by reference to their original allotment. Lemon Valley Ridge stands as the only topographic boundary, fixing the western edge of the parcel against the physical landscape. The Bevan to Goodwin transfer of 22 September 1705 records a different kind of conveyance from the cash sales seen elsewhere in the records. Bevan made the transfer for the love, good will and affection he bore to his son in law Goodwin, with no monetary consideration recorded. The instrument is therefore a family deed of gift, structured to pass the land into Goodwin's hands while preserving Bevan's own life interest and his wife's. The arrangement reflects the use of conveyancing instruments to manage inheritance within a family rather than to move land through the market. The designation of Thomas Goodwin as gentleman in the 1705 deed marks a further step in his social ascent within the records reviewed. Earlier conveyances had named him as soldier, gunner's mate, deputy storekeeper, and captain, deputy governor and storekeeper. By 1705 he had reached the standing of gentleman, the highest informal social rank below the titled nobility in English usage, which placed him at the top of the island's settler society. The designation reflected both his official position and his accumulated estate. The conditional clause providing for the land to pass instead to Goodwin's eldest son John Goodwin if he lived and resided on the island shows the use of contingent remainders to direct family property across generations. Bevan's intention was to keep the parcel within the Goodwin household but to favour a son who would actually live on the island and work the land. The construction reveals concern within the family that the heir might leave the island, with the conditional gift designed to encourage continued residence and to |

The arrangement combines the certainty of an executed conveyance with the protection of a continued life interest, a structure used in English family settlements to provide for a widow as well as the head of the household. The instrument therefore secured Bevan's wife's position even though she was not herself a party to the deed. The relationship between Bevan and Goodwin, identified in the document as father in law to son in law, places Goodwin's family within Bevan's extended household. Goodwin had married one of Bevan's daughters, although which daughter and when the marriage took place are not recorded in the materials reviewed. Bevan had appeared earlier as a witness to Thomas Harper's conveyance to Thomas Goodwin in May 1694, and the connection between the two men had therefore been long established by the time of the family deed in 1705. Speculations The Bevan to Goodwin family transfer of September 1705 represents a different dimension of Thomas Goodwin's accumulation of land on the island, distinct from the commercial purchases that had filled out his estate through the 1690s. The arrangement brought a further twenty acres into the Goodwin household without any cash outlay, secured through the family relationship rather than through the market. The transfer suggests that Bevan was settling his estate during his lifetime and that he chose to direct the parcel granted to him by the company in 1684 specifically to his son in law rather than to other family members. The contingent remainder in favour of John Goodwin, taking effect only if the son lived and resided on the island, points to a specific family concern about generational continuity. The Goodwins had risen high in the company's establishment by 1705, and there must have been a real possibility that Thomas Goodwin or his eldest son would leave the island for advancement or retirement elsewhere. Bevan's clause sought to direct the parcel to whichever member of the next generation actually settled on the island, with the land serving as both a reward for residence and an anchor to local society. The choice to defer the operation of the transfer until after the death of both Bevan and his wife reflects the standard provision for widowhood within English property arrangements of the period. The clause protected the wife's position by ensuring that the household enjoyed the use of the land for as long as either spouse survived. The arrangement also recognised that the marital partnership held the parcel jointly in practice even if the formal title rested with Bevan alone. The twenty-one-year gap between Bevan's acquisition of the parcel from the company in August 1684 and his transfer of it to Goodwin in September 1705 covers the entire span of Bevan's holding under the original grant. The transfer also coincides closely with the broader expansion of Goodwin's interests recorded across the same decade, including his commercial purchases in Sarahs Valley, Fryer Valley and on the High Peak side. The Bevan transfer added a Lemon Valley Ridge parcel to a portfolio that already extended across several districts of the island, completing a substantial estate built through both market dealings and family settlement. |

He acknowledged full payment and complete satisfaction. He bargained and sold to Powell a parcel of land of about twenty acres in Peak Gult. Ten acres had come to Hoskinson from the Honourable East India Company in exchange for about seven acres formerly held by one Richard Stay, since died, as appeared more fully in the council book of the island. The other ten acres he had bought from Edward Heath, free planter, who had received them from the company in exchange for ten acres formerly held by Samuel Jeffrey, free planter. Powell was to hold the twenty acres, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for their own use and benefit for ever. Hoskinson bound himself and his successors to warrant and defend the title against all challengers, and to allow Powell to enjoy the parcel without molestation or interruption. He set his hand and seal to the document on 11 May 1704. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of Margaret Cosgrave and John Alexander. George Hoskinson, with a seal attached. Gabriel Powell to Robert Gurling. Gabriel Powell sold the twenty acres of land described above, with all appurtenances including provisions, to Robert Gurling, gentleman, for the sum of £100 0s 0d in good current money of the island. The payment was secured by a bond from Gurling, signed and sealed, bearing the same date as the present document. Interpretations The chain of title behind the Peak Gult twenty acres reveals the company's role as a continuing party to land transactions on the island, accepting parcels back from holders in exchange for other parcels rather than only making original grants. Hoskinson had given the company about seven acres of land formerly held by Richard Stay and received ten acres in Peak Gult in return, while Heath had given the company ten acres formerly held by Samuel Jeffrey and received ten acres in Peak Gult on the same terms. The company therefore operated as a kind of land bank, taking in parcels in one location and granting parcels in another to suit the working preferences of the holders. The exchanges are recorded in the council book of the island, which served as the central administrative record for such transactions distinct from the register of conveyances. The reference to the council book alongside the conveyance suggests that the island maintained at least two separate official records relating to land. The register, certified by Daniel Griffeth as clerk of the council, recorded the formal conveyances between private parties, while the council book recorded the company's own actions in granting, exchanging and resuming parcels. The two records together provided a |

The disparity perhaps reflected differences in the quality, location or improvements of the two parcels, or it may have been part of a wider settlement in which Hoskinson surrendered other rights along with the seven acres. The Heath exchange involved equal acreage of ten for ten and therefore looks like a straightforward swap of locations, with the company satisfying Heath's preference for Peak Gult by accepting the Jeffrey parcel he was giving up. The Powell to Gurling sale of the same twenty acres on the same day, 11 May 1704, for £100 0s 0d represents a more than threefold increase over the £32 0s 0d that Hoskinson had just received from Powell for the same parcel. The difference of £68 0s 0d between the two prices, achieved in a transaction completed on the same day, points to one of two possible explanations. Powell may have been acting as an intermediate purchaser who took the parcel from Hoskinson at a fair market price and then sold it on at a substantial premium to Gurling, perhaps because Gurling needed the land urgently or because Powell had access to information Hoskinson lacked. The alternative explanation is that the Hoskinson to Powell sale at £32 0s 0d represented a notional or family-priced transaction rather than a market valuation, with the £100 0s 0d that Gurling paid being the true market price. The use of a bond from Gurling under his hand and seal to secure payment of the £100 0s 0d shows that the second transaction was conducted on credit rather than in immediate cash. The bond was a separate instrument from the conveyance itself, signed and sealed by Gurling on the same day, by which he formally undertook to pay the agreed sum. The arrangement allowed Gurling to take title to the parcel without delivering the full purchase price at the point of conveyance, with Powell relying on the bond as security for the eventual payment. The designation of Robert Gurling as gentleman places him in the highest informal social rank in the island's settler society, the same level reached by Thomas Goodwin in his 1705 deed from Owen Bevan. The status reflected a combination of wealth, social position and standing within the company's establishment that distinguished such men from the planters and soldiers who made up the broader landholding population. Gurling's willingness and capacity to commit £100 0s 0d to a single twenty-acre parcel is consistent with this elevated standing. Margaret Cosgrave's appearance as a witness to the Hoskinson to Powell conveyance, alongside John Alexander, shows that women participated as formal witnesses in the island's property transactions. Her position as witness to a high-value transaction involving an experienced administrator like Alexander indicates that she held a recognised standing within the local community, sufficient to authenticate a formal instrument. The earlier appearance of Anne Coles as witness to the John Coles to Thomas Goodwin conveyance of 1696 establishes a pattern in which women, often relatives of one of the parties, served as witnesses to family-connected transactions. Speculations The same-day chain from Hoskinson to Powell at £32 0s 0d and Powell to Gurling at £100 0s 0d perhaps |

Gurling may have been unable or unwilling to deal directly with Hoskinson, or the transfer through Powell may have served to clear some encumbrance or family interest. The size of the differential, more than threefold within a single day, makes a pure commercial speculation by Powell hard to credit and points instead to a structured arrangement whose details are not visible in the deed. The alternative reading is that Powell acted as a genuine intermediate buyer who took advantage of an underpriced sale from Hoskinson and resold immediately at a higher price. If so, the transaction reveals the existence of significant information asymmetries within the island's small property market, with knowledgeable dealers able to extract substantial margins from less well-positioned sellers. Hoskinson's willingness to sell at £32 0s 0d, when the parcel could realise £100 0s 0d on the same day, would then point to either pressing financial need or limited knowledge of current market values. The company's exchange practice, by which Hoskinson surrendered the Stay parcel for ten Peak Gult acres and Heath surrendered the Jeffrey parcel for another ten Peak Gult acres, suggests a deliberate company policy of consolidating its own holdings or redistributing land to address particular tenancy issues. The company perhaps wanted to reclaim parcels held by deceased planters whose successors had not taken them up, and offered active planters fresh land in Peak Gult in exchange for accepting older or fragmented parcels back into company hands. The mechanism allowed both the company and the planters to reshape their holdings without resorting to the open market. The recording of the Stay and Jeffrey parcels as held by men since died, with the company subsequently exchanging them for fresh grants, suggests that the company reclaimed land from deceased planters whose estates had not been continued by living successors. The Jeffrey parcel had been sold by Samuel Jeffrey to Henry Kersey in November 1683, and Kersey had sold it on to Thomas Goodwin in December 1691, so the parcel identified here as formerly Jeffrey's is not the same Fryer Valley land traced in the earlier conveyances but a separate piece of ground originally allotted to Jeffrey that had returned to company hands after his death. |

Gabriel Powell, with a seal attached. 5 June 1705. Thomas Cole to Richard Swallow. Richard Swallow bought from Thomas Cole, free planter, for the sum of £104 0s 0d in current money of the island, a mansion house, seventeen acres of land and the provisions standing on the land. The mansion house and ten acres of the land had formerly belonged to Richard Leach, since died, and the remaining seven acres had formerly belonged to John Hemmons. The seventeen acres lay at the head of Deep Valley and were bounded on all sides, north, south, east and west, by the Right Honourable Company's waste land. The land lay in Cole's own possession at the time of the conveyance. Swallow was to hold the property, with his heirs and assigns, for ever.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

Island of St Helena. Robert Marsh to William Dufton the elder. Robert Marsh, unmarried man, aged twenty-one years, made known that he had received the sum of £20 0s 0d in current money of the island. He gave, granted, bargained and sold to William Dufton the elder twenty acres of land with all appurtenances. The land had formerly belonged to Edward Gardener, since died, and lay in Dufton's own possession at the time of the conveyance. Dufton was to hold the parcel, with his heirs, for ever. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of George Hoskinson, John Long, William Hayes and John Alexander. Robert Marsh, with a seal attached. Interpretations The Robert Marsh to William Dufton conveyance of 9 August 1705 resolves the question raised by the earlier deed of 5 May 1703, in which William Marsh had sold the same twenty acres to William Dufton the soldier acting on behalf of his son Robert. The 1705 instrument is a direct conveyance from Robert Marsh himself, now twenty-one years old, in which he confirms the sale and receives the consideration in his own right. The arrangement shows the careful sequencing by which a minor's beneficial interest was protected during his youth and then formally cleared by his own act on reaching the age of majority. The 1703 transaction had moved the land into Dufton's working possession, while the 1705 deed gave Dufton an unimpeachable title from the beneficial owner once he was legally able to make it. The explicit recording of Robert Marsh's age as twenty-one years carries direct legal significance, since twenty-one was the age at which a person attained full majority in English law and could execute binding deeds in their own name. The drafter of the document included the age to demonstrate that Marsh had reached the point at which his confirmation of the earlier sale carried unquestionable legal weight. The detail also fits with the pattern visible in the William Marsh sales of Robert's beneficial interest, which had been conducted while Robert was a minor and required his eventual ratification. The description of Robert Marsh as singleman, meaning unmarried man, marks a status distinct from married, widowed or in religious orders. The term identified the maker of the deed as a free agent acting on his own behalf, without a wife whose interests might have been affected by the conveyance. The category appears here because it was legally relevant to the validity of the transaction, since a married man's disposition of property could be complicated by his wife's dower rights or other marital interests. |

|                    |                 |                   | The consideration of £20 0s 0d for the twenty acres gives a per-acre figure of £1 0s 0d, falling between the upland rates of nine shillings per acre at Oak Gutt and the £1 2s 0d to £1 5s 0d per acre that Goodwin paid for Fryer Valley parcels. The figure represents a market rate for upland land of moderate quality and confirms that the per-acre value of land on the island fell within a recognisable range by the mid-1700s. The same individuals continue to dominate the witness lists across the conveyances reviewed. John Alexander appears in his now familiar role, present at the Bevan, Hoskinson, Higham and Marsh transactions and certifying earlier deeds as a copyist. George Hoskinson, the seller in the Peak Gult transaction of May 1704, here serves as a witness to Marsh's conveyance to Dufton, showing his continuing presence within the island's circle of formal witnesses. The recurring names indicate that a small group of literate men, often connected with the company's administrative or commercial activities, served as the witnesses and certifiers for the bulk of the island's recorded property transactions. The Cole to Swallow conveyance of 5 June 1705 records the highest-value rural transaction in the records reviewed, with £104 0s 0d paid for a mansion house, seventeen acres and provisions at the head of Deep Valley. The price stands in striking contrast to the £25 0s 0d to £35 0s 0d typical of twenty-acre Sarahs Valley parcels with houses ten years earlier and approaches the £130 0s 0d that Goodwin had paid for the Chapel Valley town tenement in 1700. The presence of a mansion house, rather than a simple dwelling house, accounts for much of the difference, since the term mansion implied a substantial residence of size and finish beyond the ordinary planter's house. The reference to the Right Honourable Company's waste land as the boundary on all four sides of the Cole parcel reveals the geographic isolation of the holding at the head of Deep Valley. The seventeen acres formed an island of private land entirely surrounded by retained company ground, with no neighbouring freehold parcels adjoining it. The position fits the upland topography of Deep Valley, where settlement was sparse and the company's waste land extended over wide tracts. The combination of two separate former holdings into the seventeen-acre parcel, with ten acres formerly Leach's and seven acres formerly Hemmons's, follows the pattern of consolidation seen elsewhere in the records. Cole had brought together two distinct origins into a single working holding before selling on to Swallow, with the mansion house standing on the Leach portion. The Hemmons name connects to the John Hemmons of Pleasant Valley who appears in the 1682 register, although the seven acres at the head of Deep Valley represent a separate fragment of his holdings from the ten acres of Pleasant Valley land he had exchanged with Henry Coales. The Higham to Bell conveyance of 3 August 1704 records an urban transaction in Chapel Valley with strikingly different proportions from the rural deeds. The parcel measured twenty-four feet by sixteen feet, a total area of 384 square feet, sold for £5 0s 0d. The plot adjoined Bell's existing house and stood directly opposite the burying place, an identifiable landmark in the town. The transaction shows how small urban plots were measured and conveyed by linear feet rather than by acres, in the same form as the earlier Gurling to Carne sale of a sixteen and a half foot frontage. Bell was extending or providing land alongside his existing holding, a common form of urban property growth where adjacent ground became available. The proximity of the parcel to the burying place identifies the location of the Chapel Valley graveyard as |

The cemetery served as a fixed landmark against which other properties could be located, in the same way as ridges and gullies functioned for rural parcels. The naming of the burying place in a formal conveyance shows that the location was sufficiently well established by 1704 to serve as an authoritative reference. Speculations The 1705 confirmation by Robert Marsh of the earlier 1703 sale by his father suggests a deliberate two-stage approach to settling the beneficial interest in the Edward Gardener twenty acres. William Marsh had effected the operational transfer to Dufton in 1703 while Robert was still a minor, accepting the purchase money on his son's behalf, and the 1705 deed by the now adult Robert closed off any later claim by him against Dufton's title. The arrangement protected both parties: Dufton secured his title against future challenge, and the Marsh family received the consideration during the period when the working transfer was needed. The careful structuring contrasts with the earlier Gardener transaction in which William Marsh sold his son's beneficial interest to Dweight, where no equivalent confirmation by Robert has appeared in the records. The very high price of £104 0s 0d that Swallow paid for the Cole holding at the head of Deep Valley points to either a particularly substantial mansion house or to specific value attached to the consolidated nature of the seventeen acres surrounded entirely by company waste land. The isolation of the parcel from any other private holdings would have given the holder unimpeded access to the surrounding waste for grazing, woodcutting or other auxiliary uses, even though the title to that surrounding land remained with the company. The premium may reflect the practical value of this de facto control over a larger area than the formal acreage suggests. The structure of the Cole holding, with the ten acres and mansion house from Leach combined with the seven acres from Hemmons, follows a pattern by which planters built up working units from fragments of earlier allotments. The Leach portion would have provided the dwelling and the principal cultivated ground, while the Hemmons addition extended the working area. By bringing both into a single sale, Cole offered Swallow a unified holding that could be acquired in one transaction rather than assembled piecemeal. Robert Bell's acquisition of the small Chapel Valley plot adjoining his house perhaps reflects the gradual incremental growth of urban holdings within the town. Owners of town houses sought to acquire adjacent ground as it came available, extending their plots in small increments rather than relocating to larger sites. The £5 0s 0d that Bell paid for the 384 square feet, which works out to a substantial rate per unit area compared with rural land, shows that town ground commanded premium prices even for small parcels. |

The thirty acres he had earlier sold had formerly belonged to Edward Gardener, since died, who had bequeathed them to Robert Marsh. The ten acres now delivered lay between the land formerly held by Richard Parram and the land of Jonathan Dufton, formerly held by William Dufton. The parcel began at the old piece of wall in the gutt next to the land formerly held by John Hemmons and ran up the watercourse. He gave, granted, bargained, sold and delivered to George Dweight, free planter, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a parcel of land of about ten acres in [Tshars] Valley, with all appurtenances. The land had formerly belonged to Edward Gardener, since died. Dweight was to hold the parcel, with his heirs, for ever. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of George Hoskinson, John Long, William Hayes and John Alexander. Robert Marsh, with a seal attached. Elizabeth Rhodes to Margaret Cotgrave. Margaret Cotgrave, widow and relict of John Cotgrave, late free planter of the island of St Helena, since died, made known that her late husband had paid £10 0s 0d to Elizabeth Rhodes, lawful wife and attorney of William Rhodes, free planter, since died and then absent from the island. By that payment ten acres of land formerly held by William Rhodes, lying at the head of Sharks Valley, now remained in Margaret Cotgrave's possession, to dispose of at her own will and pleasure. Interpretations The three transactions of 29 August 1705 reveal the carefully structured settlement by which the Gardener inheritance was finally cleared. Edward Gardener had bequeathed thirty acres to Robert Marsh, the son of William Marsh. William Marsh had sold twenty acres of this inheritance to Dufton in 1703 and ten acres to Dweight at some earlier date, both transactions executed while Robert was still a minor. The first of the three deeds dated 29 August acknowledged these earlier sales as having taken place out of Robert's inheritance, and in compensation William delivered to Robert a different ten-acre parcel together with three head of cattle and a year's supply of yams. The second and third deeds confirmed Robert's title in the parcels his father had sold, with the 1705 confirmation by Robert ratifying the earlier Dufton sale, and a separate deed dated the same day passing the remaining ten acres to Dweight directly from Robert. The arrangement reveals a sophisticated approach to managing a minor's inherited estate. William Marsh had acted on Robert's behalf during his minority, selling parts of the inheritance for what would have been the family's working purposes and accepting the proceeds. On Robert's reaching majority, the family executed a series of instruments that simultaneously compensated Robert for the lost land, confirmed the buyers' titles by Robert's own act, and discharged William's accountability for the earlier sales. The transactions of a single day therefore closed off all loose ends in the inheritance, leaving Robert with a substituted holding and the buyers with secure title. The substitute parcel given to Robert by his father included not only ten acres of land but also livestock and provisions, indicating that William Marsh was settling a complete working subsistence on his son. The year's supply of yams provided immediate food security while the new holding was brought into Robert's own cultivation. The package amounted to a structured entry into independent farming, far more carefully provided than a simple transfer of acreage. The boundary description of Robert's new parcel, with the old piece of wall in the gutt as a starting point and the watercourse as a line of extension, anchors the land in physical features rather than in neighbouring holders alone. The reference to an old wall suggests that earlier cultivation had taken place on or near the parcel, with stone work remaining as evidence of past use. The watercourse running along the boundary provided both a natural marker and a water supply, although whether Robert's right extended to the water itself or merely to the line of the course is not specified. The price of £8 16s 0d that Dweight paid Robert Marsh for the ten acres of his confirmation deed, lower than the £20 0s 0d that Dufton had paid for the parallel twenty acres, reflects a per-acre figure of seventeen shillings and seven pence. The figure falls well below the £1 0s 0d per acre rate of the Dufton transaction, suggesting either differences in the quality of the two parcels or that the Dweight payment may have included only the residual balance after earlier payments to William Marsh. The earlier Dweight payment to William Marsh, recorded in the 20 February 1703 register entry but without a specified sum, may have accounted for the bulk of the consideration with Robert's 1705 confirmation receiving only a top-up. The Cotgrave to Rhodes transaction records a different kind of arrangement, with property moving through the agency of a wife acting for an absent husband. Elizabeth Rhodes held a formal power of attorney from her husband William Rhodes, allowing her to deal with his property on his behalf while he was away from the island. The phrase lawful wife and attorney identifies the dual basis of her authority, with her marriage giving her standing within the household and the attorney's instrument giving her formal legal capacity to transact. The arrangement shows that absent landholders maintained their interests through proxies, with their wives as the most common choice of agent. The payment of £10 0s 0d by John Cotgrave to Elizabeth Rhodes for the ten acres at the head of Sharks Valley gives a per-acre figure of £1 0s 0d, consistent with the Dufton rate and with the £1 2s 0d per acre at which Coles sold his Fryer Valley parcel to Goodwin. The price establishes a market value for upland and valley-head land of moderate quality that runs across multiple transactions. The transaction also reveals that the original sale by Elizabeth Rhodes had taken place during the lifetime of John Cotgrave, with the parcel now passing into the hands of his widow as part of her dower or inheritance. The naming of Margaret Cotgrave as widow and relict of John Cotgrave shows the careful legal terminology used to identify a surviving spouse. Widow indicated her current marital status, while relict was the technical term for a woman whose husband had died, emphasising her formal position as the surviving party to the marriage. The double designation gave her standing under both modern and traditional legal vocabulary and reinforced her capacity to deal with the property she now held. Both William Rhodes and his wife are recorded as if there is some uncertainty over William's status, with the deed noting that he was then absent from the island when Elizabeth executed the original sale. The text describes him in the present passage as deceased, suggesting that he had since died, perhaps abroad, leaving the question of his death somewhat unsettled at |

The arrangement points to the difficulties of long-distance property administration in the early eighteenth century, with island landholders abroad relying on their wives to manage interests they could not directly oversee. The witness lists for the two Marsh transactions of 29 August 1705 are identical, with George Hoskinson, John Long, William Hayes and John Alexander present at both. The repetition shows that the four men attended together as a coordinated group, witnessing the related instruments in sequence as part of a single occasion. The arrangement allowed the entire Gardener inheritance to be settled in a single sitting, with all parties and witnesses present to confirm the multiple transfers at one time. Speculations The structuring of the 29 August 1705 transactions on a single day, with William Marsh delivering substitute land, livestock and provisions to Robert, and Robert immediately confirming both prior sales, suggests careful planning rather than spontaneous settlement. The family had perhaps reached an understanding well in advance of Robert's twenty-first birthday about how the various interests would be resolved, with the necessary deeds prepared and witnesses assembled for execution on the appointed date. The orderly progression of the three instruments, each addressing a different aspect of the Gardener inheritance, points to legal advice and prior agreement among the parties. The provision of cattle and yams alongside the substitute land suggests that William Marsh was concerned to settle Robert with a functioning agricultural unit rather than simply transferring bare ground. The decision to include twelve months of food provisions reveals an estimate of the time required for Robert to bring his new holding into productive yield. The package would have allowed Robert to focus on cultivating the new parcel without the immediate pressure of growing or buying his own food, giving him a realistic chance of establishing himself as an independent planter. The very modest price of £8 16s 0d that Dweight paid Robert Marsh for the ten acres, particularly when compared to the £20 0s 0d Dufton had paid for the related twenty acres, points to the earlier Dweight payment to William Marsh having covered the substantial portion of the price. The 1705 transaction was perhaps a residual settlement, with Dweight paying Robert directly for his consent to the original sale rather than the full market value of the land. The arrangement reflects how the family resolved Robert's interest by having Dweight contribute a token payment in confirmation of the earlier transfer. Elizabeth Rhodes's role as her absent husband's attorney points to a wider pattern of women managing island property during their husbands' absences. The position required not only personal authority within the household but formal legal capacity to execute conveyances and receive payments. The recording of her dual designation as lawful wife and attorney shows that the formal documentation of her authority was important to the validity of her transactions, since a purchaser would have needed assurance that she was empowered to bind her absent husband's estate. The chain by which the ten acres at the head of Sharks Valley reached Margaret Cotgrave runs through her late husband's purchase from Elizabeth Rhodes as attorney for the absent William Rhodes. The transaction therefore involved at least three layers of representation: William Rhodes acting through his attorney Elizabeth, John Cotgrave acting in his own right, and Margaret Cotgrave now holding as her late husband's widow. The complexity of these arrangements indicates the developed conveyancing practice on the island by the |

Margaret Cotgrave also held a dwelling house in Chapel Valley. Her late husband John Cotgrave had bought the house from Thomas Tewsdale, free planter, since died, for the sum of £35 12s 0d. The transaction was set out more fully in a bill of sale signed by Tewsdale, dated 19 April 1694. Witnesses to the bill of sale were John Long, Samuel Booker and Matthew Bazett. Island of St Helena, 27 April 1698. John Greentree to Elizabeth Johnson. John Greentree, free planter of the island of St Helena, addressed all Christian people who might come to see the document and sent greeting in the Lord God. He acknowledged that for good causes, and more particularly for the valuable consideration of £20 0s 0d in lawful money of the island, the sum being present credit in the stores of the Right Honourable English East India Company, paid at or before the sealing and delivery of the document, he sold to Mrs Elizabeth Johnson, widow of the island, her heirs, executors and administrators, a parcel of land. The land had been the lot of John Greentree, since died, and contained about twenty acres. It lay in Lemon Valley, bordering Johnson's own estate known as the Great Bottom, and bordering the company's common on all sides. Johnson was to hold the parcel, with its appurtenances, freely and quietly, without interruption, to be enjoyed by her and her heirs for ever. Greentree set his hand and seal to the document on 27 April 1698. Witnesses: John Goodwin, Richard Harding, F. Gargan and F. Robert Leach to George Carne. Robert Leach, free planter of the island, addressed all Christian people who might come to see the document and sent greeting. He acknowledged that he had received the sum of £25 0s 0d in current money of the island in advance from Mrs Mary Carne. For this consideration and for other good causes, he sold to Mrs Mary Carne, as lawful attorney of Mr George Carne and as agreed with George Carne before his departure from the island, fifteen acres of land. The land had formerly belonged to the orphans of Mary Dixon, since died, and had been delivered to Robert Leach as part of his wife's portion, now known as Ann Leach's portion, on the island. The land lay near the head of Fryer Valley. Ten acres of the parcel bordered the Right Honourable Company's great plantation on the east, the land belonging to the late Governor Keeling on the south, and the land belonging to Walter Morres [on the west]. Interpretations The Cotgrave dwelling house in Chapel Valley represents a separate strand of the late John Cotgrave's estate from the Sharks Valley ten acres held by his widow. The house had been bought from Thomas Tewsdale on 19 April 1694 for £35 12s 0d, a sum sitting between the £30 0s 0d that Casthope paid Harper for a twenty-acre Sarahs Valley parcel with a house a month earlier and the £25 0s 0d that Harper paid Fox for the comparable parcel he later sold to Goodwin. The Cotgrave house price points to a Chapel Valley dwelling of more substantial standing than a planter's rural house, though well below the £130 0s 0d that Goodwin paid for the large tenement bought from Edmunds in 1700. The figure helps to establish a middle band of urban property values in the 1690s, situated between modest rural houses and the high-status town tenements that came on the market a few years later. |

|                    |                 |                   | The use of present credit in the stores of the Right Honourable English East India Company as the form of the consideration in the Greentree to Johnson conveyance reveals a distinctive feature of the island's monetary arrangements. The £20 0s 0d that Johnson paid for the twenty acres was not necessarily delivered in coin but as a credit balance with the company's stores, which functioned as a kind of bank within the local economy. Settlers held credit balances at the stores that they could draw on to acquire goods, and these balances could be transferred between parties as the equivalent of cash for property transactions. The arrangement allowed the company's stores to serve as a clearing house for settler accounts in the absence of a more developed banking system. The Greentree parcel had originally been the lot of John Greentree the elder, since died, and the seller John Greentree was probably his son or other heir. The transaction therefore continues the pattern of inherited parcels passing through the second generation of settlers on the island, with the children of original allottees converting their inheritance into cash or stores credit for their own purposes. The land lay in Lemon Valley adjoining Johnson's own established estate at the Great Bottom, which made the parcel a natural extension of her existing holding. The boundary description in the Greentree deed identifies Elizabeth Johnson's existing Lemon Valley holding by the local name the Great Bottom, suggesting that the term was sufficiently well established to serve as an authoritative reference without further description. The phrase fits the pattern of named topographic features used as landmarks across the island's deeds, alongside named ridges, valleys, gulls and other features. The retention of such names in the formal record shows that the island's vernacular geography had stabilised by the late seventeenth century to a degree that the deeds could rely on shared local knowledge for boundary identification. Mrs Elizabeth Johnson's purchase, completed in her own name as widow, places her alongside Mary Barrington, Sarah Harding, Margaret Cotgrave and Margaret Fagnald as widows actively dealing with island property in their own capacity. The recurrence of widows as property holders and parties to conveyances across the records indicates that widowhood was a recognised legal and social status with substantial economic implications. Widows held, bought, sold and managed property on terms close to those available to men, although the contexts in which they did so often arose from the death of a husband rather than from their own original allotments. The Robert Leach to George Carne conveyance introduces a new figure of female agency in the form of Mrs Mary Carne, who acted as the lawful attorney of her husband Mr George Carne under an arrangement agreed before his departure from the island. The structure parallels that of Elizabeth Rhodes, who acted as attorney for her absent husband William Rhodes in the Cotgrave transaction. The pattern of wives acting as their husbands' attorneys during absences from the island appears as a standard mechanism for managing property interests when the principal was overseas. The position required formal legal capacity, conferred by the husband through a power of attorney executed before his departure, and entitled the wife to bind her husband's estate by her own acts. The fifteen acres conveyed by Leach to Carne had reached him by a different route from the other parcels in the records. Mary Dixon, since died, had originally held land that passed to her orphans on her death, and the parcel had been delivered to Robert Leach as part of his wife Ann's portion. The phrase his wife's portion identifies the land as Ann Leach's marriage settlement, |

The transaction therefore involved property that had moved through three generations: Mary Dixon's holding, her orphans' inheritance, and Ann Leach's marriage portion. By 1705 the parcel had become part of the Leach household estate but retained its identification as Ann's portion within the family. The naming of the late Governor Keeling as the holder of land bordering the Carne parcel on the south reveals that company officials could hold private property on the island in their own right while serving in office. Keeling's status as governor did not exclude him from the freehold market, and his estate appears to have remained identifiable as Keeling's land after his death. The pattern matches the practice seen in Thomas Goodwin's accumulations, where company office and private landholding coexisted within the same individual. The boundary description of the Carne parcel identifies the Right Honourable Company's great plantation on the east, marking a further category of company-held land distinct from the company's common, the company's waste and the company's lot land. The great plantation suggests a substantial company-managed estate, perhaps dedicated to the production of provisions for the garrison and shipping, distinguished from the common grazing lands and the waste ground awaiting allotment. The terminology shows that the company maintained several different classes of land on the island under direct management, each serving a different function within the island's economy. The price of £25 0s 0d for fifteen acres at the head of Fryer Valley gives a per-acre figure of £1 13s 4d, the highest rate seen in the Fryer Valley transactions reviewed. The figure stands above the £1 5s 0d per acre at which Kersey sold to Goodwin in 1691 and the £1 2s 0d per acre at which Coles sold to Goodwin in 1696, suggesting either an upward trend in Fryer Valley land values across the period or a particular premium attaching to this parcel because of its position adjoining the company's great plantation and the Keeling estate. The high price perhaps reflects the prestige of the neighbouring holdings as much as the intrinsic value of the land itself. Speculations The structure of the Leach to Carne sale, in which Mary Carne paid the consideration in advance on behalf of her absent husband, points to a planned acquisition arranged before George Carne's departure from the island. The agreement of the price and the identification of the parcel had taken place during George's presence, and Mary's role was to complete the transaction when the land became available or when convenient. The arrangement perhaps reflects a deliberate use of the period of George's absence to settle property interests that would benefit the household on his return, with Mary holding both the funds and the authority to act when the conditions for the transaction were satisfied. Elizabeth Johnson's acquisition of the Greentree twenty acres in Lemon Valley, adjoining her existing Great Bottom estate, fits the pattern of consolidation seen across the records. Holders sought to extend their working estates by adding adjacent parcels as they came on the market, building up continuous blocks of land rather than scattered holdings. The use of company stores credit as the payment instrument suggests that Johnson maintained substantial credit balances with the company, which she could deploy to acquire neighbouring land without recourse to cash transactions. Her position as a widow with an established Lemon Valley estate placed her in a strong |

The parcel carried with it the recorded history of three women's involvement: Mary Dixon's original holding, Ann Leach's marriage portion, and Mary Carne's acquisition as her husband's attorney. The persistence of the female identification of the parcel as Ann's portion within the Leach household, even after the marriage had absorbed it into Robert Leach's estate, points to a continuing recognition of women's contributions to family property even where formal title rested with their husbands.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

Mary Oliver bound and obligated herself to serve George Carne, his heirs and assigns, as a menial servant. She also bound her two children Mary and Elizabeth to the same service until each came of age. Any child she might have in future was likewise to be bound until coming of age. Mary Oliver herself was not to leave the service of George Carne, his heirs and assigns, until the youngest of all her children came of age. If all her children died, she would serve only for a further period of seven years. In return, George Carne bound himself, his heirs and assigns to take care of Mary and her children, to clothe and maintain them in diet, and in all just considerations according to the custom of the island fit for such a servant. He also bound himself to keep her and her children free of all parish charge. The parties set their hands and seals to the document on 10 September 1706. Witnesses: John Rogers and Walter Morres.George Carne, with a seal attached.Mary Oliver made her mark in the form of an O, with a seal attached.Bento Pedro Demallo receipt to Mr Carne.Bento Pedro Demallo acknowledged receipt from Mr George Carne of the balance of all accounts and effects which Demallo had previously left in Carne's custody. |                    |                 |                   | the records, an indenture of servitude binding a free islander and her dependants to long-term unpaid labour. The arrangement is a contract of indentured service in which Mary Oliver surrenders her own and her children's labour to George Carne in exchange for maintenance. The instrument operates as a private welfare arrangement that takes Mary and her family off the island's wider support obligations while subjecting them to the disposal of a single household for a generation or more. The duration of the obligation extends until the youngest of Mary Oliver's children comes of age, an open-ended term that would have committed her for decades depending on her future fertility. The clause binding any future children to the same service shows that the indenture was designed to capture not just the existing family but any subsequent additions to it. The arrangement effectively transferred to Carne the lifetime labour of Mary Oliver and the labour of her descendants during their minorities, with the obligation only ending when no children remained who were under age. The conditional clause providing for a seven-year term in the event that all her children died reveals the calculated structure of the agreement. If the children died and removed the open-ended obligation, Mary would still owe a substantial fixed period of service. The clause prevented her from escaping the indenture through the loss of her children and ensured that Carne received a minimum return on his commitment to maintenance regardless of family circumstances. The phrase parish charge identifies a structure of public welfare obligation on the island, with parishes responsible for supporting destitute persons who could not otherwise provide for themselves. Carne's undertaking to keep Mary and her children free of parish charge points to a community-level liability that the indenture was designed to displace. Mary Oliver had perhaps been at risk of falling onto parish support, and the arrangement removed her and her family from that prospective burden by placing the cost of maintenance on a single private household. The description of George Carne as merchant places him in the same category as Mr Robert Swallow and other figures who carried the formal designation of trader or commercial dealer rather than planter or soldier. The indenture reveals Carne as a man of substantial private resources capable of taking on the maintenance of an entire family in exchange for their labour, supporting his earlier appearance in the records as the recipient of the Gurling Chapel Valley plot and the buyer of the Leach Fryer Valley parcel. His position as merchant identifies him as part of the commercial layer of the island's settler society. The phrase menial servant identifies a specific category of household labour, with the term meaning a domestic worker performing the manual tasks of a household rather than skilled or supervisory work. The use of the term places Mary Oliver and her future children in the lowest tier of household labour, available for any work that the Carne household required. The breadth of the obligation matched the breadth of the maintenance commitment, with Carne taking responsibility for diet, clothing and other support in return for unrestricted labour. Mary Oliver's mark in the form of an O confirms that she could not write her name, an unsurprising feature in a contract committing her to menial service. The mark gave her formal assent to the document but reveals the very limited literacy of the contracting party, who depended on the spoken explanation of the terms and on the witnesses to confirm that the document represented what had been agreed. |

|                    |                 |                   | The Bento Pedro Demallo receipt of 5 November 1706 records a different kind of transaction within the records, a settlement of accounts between George Carne and a man whose Portuguese name marks him as different in origin from the settler population. Demallo had left accounts and effects in Carne's custody and now received their balance back, indicating that Carne had acted as a custodian of Demallo's property and financial interests during some period of absence or trust. The transaction shows that Carne was operating as a merchant who held funds and goods on behalf of others, consistent with his commercial designation. The name Bento Pedro Demallo is recognisably Portuguese in form, suggesting that Demallo was either a Portuguese national or of Portuguese extraction, perhaps connected with the trade between Portuguese establishments in West Africa, Brazil or India and the East India Company shipping that called at St Helena. The island's position on the route between Europe and the Indian Ocean made it a place where men of different national origins encountered each other and conducted business across cultural lines. The recording of the receipt in the island's register shows that such transactions were treated as part of the formal record alongside the conveyances and indentures of the settler population. Speculations The Mary Oliver indenture perhaps arose from a moment of acute personal crisis in which she had no other means of supporting her two young daughters. The terms of the arrangement, surrendering her own and her children's labour for an open-ended period in exchange for basic maintenance, suggest that she was negotiating from a position of weakness rather than choice. Carne's willingness to take on the obligation indicates that the labour of a woman and her growing daughters was valued highly enough by his household to justify the commitment to maintenance. The arrangement converts a potential parish burden into a private labour resource on terms that benefit the receiving household while removing the woman's independence. The contingent seven-year clause in the indenture, taking effect if all Mary Oliver's children died, hints at the calculations on both sides of the agreement. Carne stood to lose his investment in maintenance if the children died young and the indenture lapsed with their decease, so the seven-year minimum term protected him against that risk. Mary Oliver in turn faced the prospect of a much longer obligation if her children survived to adulthood, with no escape from the service short of their reaching the age of majority. The structure illustrates the unequal bargaining position of a destitute woman in a small island community where alternatives to such an arrangement were limited. The Demallo receipt suggests that George Carne operated as a small-scale financial intermediary on the island, holding accounts and effects for clients who needed someone to manage their interests during their absences or for other reasons. The role overlaps with the broader pattern of female attorneys acting for absent husbands, but in Demallo's case the principal was apparently not present on the island either, leaving his affairs in Carne's hands until they could be settled. Carne's combination of merchant activity, property dealings, indenture-taking and financial custody points to a multifaceted commercial role that drew together several different threads of the island's economic life. The four-day gap between the Leach to Carne conveyance of 4 January 1705 and Margaret Fagnald's protest of 16 February 1704 against the Gurling to Carne transaction places the two Carne acquisitions within months of each other. The protest concerned an earlier Carne purchase of a small plot behind Margaret |

The house adjoined that of Charles Steward and that of Robert Goodwin, formerly held by John Goodwin, since died. The premises also included the ground and garden on the back side of the house as far as the watercourse. Nicholls had bought the property from John Bowman, late free planter, since died, for the sum of £20 0s 0d in ready money. Philip Savage to John Fuller. Philip Savage, free planter of the island of St Helena, made known by these presents that he had received the sum of £8 2s 6d, paid in hand at or before the sealing and delivery of the document. For this consideration and for other good causes, he gave, granted, alienated, bargained and sold to Mr John Fuller, free planter of the same island, all his right and title in ten acres of land. The parcel bordered land then held by Henry Kersey and William Fox the elder, free planters, as set out in the register book of the island. The conveyance included all appurtenances, comprising the plantation, provisions, hedges, ditches, walls, fences, water and watercourses, timber trees and all other appurtenances. Fuller was to hold the ten acres, with all appurtenances, in as full a measure as Savage had enjoyed them, to himself, his heirs and assigns. Savage bound himself and his successors to allow Fuller to hold the parcel without hindrance, trouble or molestation from any person claiming through him. He warranted that the title was good and lawful and that Fuller and his heirs were to enjoy the premises for ever. Savage set his hand and seal to the document on 20 March 1686, in the year of our Lord according to the computation of the Church of England, and in the second year of the reign of King James the Second of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith. Signed, sealed and delivered, and possession given, in the presence of Thomas Harper, John Bagley and Thomas Goodwin. A true copy by John Alexander, register. Philip Savage, with a seal attached. Interpretations The Bowman to Nicholls entry identifies a third named urban location on the island, Fort James Valley, distinct from the Chapel Valley Town encountered in earlier deeds. The name Fort James indicates the fortification at the heart of the island's defensive arrangements, named in honour of King James, and the surrounding valley took its identity from the fort itself. The location of dwelling houses by reference to Fort James Valley shows that the company's main fortification served as the central reference point for one of the principal settled areas on the island, alongside the broader Chapel Valley district where most rural and urban transactions were located. The Nicholls property included the dwelling house, the ground and garden on the back side of the house, with the watercourse forming the rear boundary. The arrangement matches the typical pattern of an urban or near-urban holding in which the principal value lay in the house and the immediately associated cultivated ground rather than in extensive acreage. The watercourse as a back boundary shows how water |

The phrase ready money suggests payment in cash or its equivalent at the moment of conveyance, distinguishing the transaction from those that involved bonds, credit at the company stores, or other forms of deferred or alternative consideration. The clarity of the cash basis confirms that Bowman received immediate value for the sale. The Savage to Fuller conveyance of 20 March 1686 is the earliest deed in the records reviewed apart from the Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance of November 1683. The dating clause records the year by the computation of the Church of England, marking the document as following the calendar that began the year on Lady Day, 25 March. The deed was executed five days before the change of year, so by modern reckoning the date falls in 1686 although the document itself uses 1685 in line with the old style. The regnal year, the second of James the Second, confirms the dating, since the king came to the throne in February 1685 and the second year ran from February 1686. The price of £8 2s 6d for ten acres adjoining the lands of Henry Kersey and William Fox the elder gives a per-acre figure of sixteen shillings and threepence. The figure stands between the early ten-shillings-per-acre rate of the 1683 Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance and the £1 5s 0d to £1 13s 4d per acre rates of the 1690s Fryer Valley sales. The 1686 price points to a moderate appreciation of Fryer Valley land during the three years since the Jeffrey conveyance, with further substantial increases following in the next decade. The specific sum, including pence as well as pounds and shillings, suggests a precisely negotiated figure rather than a rounded price. The enumeration of appurtenances in the Savage deed reaches further than any other in the records reviewed. The list includes plantation, provisions, hedges, ditches, walls, fences, water, watercourses and timber trees, going beyond the Kersey to Goodwin 1691 list to include timber trees as a distinct category. The explicit naming of timber trees confirms that wood on the parcel was treated as part of the conveyance, with the buyer acquiring the standing trees along with the land. The earlier Jeffrey to Kersey memorandum penalising the seller for cutting wood after the sale had reflected the same concern in a different form, with the explicit naming in the Savage deed providing an alternative protection by clearly transferring the property in the timber. The phrase given possession in the witness clause of the Savage deed marks the formal delivery of physical control of the parcel from seller to buyer at the moment of execution. The act of putting the buyer into possession was a traditional element of feoffment, in which the seller would walk the buyer over the land or otherwise symbolically deliver it. The recording of possession given in the witness clause provides documentary confirmation that the symbolic act had taken place in the presence of the witnesses, satisfying both the legal and the customary requirements for a complete freehold transfer. The witnessing of the Savage deed by Thomas Goodwin in March 1686, three years after his witness signature on the Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance of November 1683 and seven years before his first recorded purchase in his own name in May 1693, extends the period of his presence on the island as a literate observer of property transactions. The two early witness signatures establish that Goodwin had been on |

Alexander had appeared earlier as a witness and certifier of later transactions in 1703 and 1704, and his role here as register in 1686 shows that he had held the position for at least eighteen years across the records reviewed. The continuity of his appearance in the formal record-keeping function points to a long career in the island's administrative service, with the register's office passing to him for an extended period. Speculations Thomas Goodwin's repeated appearance as a witness to property transactions in the 1680s, before any of his own purchases, points to a long apprenticeship in the island's conveyancing practice. His later success in accumulating a substantial private estate may have rested in part on the connections and the understanding of the local property market that he developed during this earlier period. The pattern suggests that a junior administrative officer could position himself to identify and pursue opportunities by serving first as a witness and clerical participant, then later acting as a purchaser when his own resources and standing allowed. The price of £8 2s 6d for the Savage parcel, falling oddly precisely in the middle of the early Fryer Valley range, perhaps reflects a particular calculation in the negotiation between the parties. The shillings and pence components suggest that the price was reached by reference to a specific valuation rather than rounded to a convenient figure, perhaps based on the assessment of distinct elements of the parcel such as the bare land, the provisions, the timber and the improvements. The precision of the figure points to a degree of valuation practice in the island's property market that went beyond rough rule-of-thumb pricing. The Bowman to Nicholls transaction reveals the existence of a secondary urban centre in Fort James Valley alongside the larger Chapel Valley Town. The location near the fortification would have attracted residents connected with the garrison and the company's military and administrative operations, distinct from the more commercial character of the Chapel Valley settlement. The growth of two distinct urban clusters on the island by the late seventeenth century indicates a settled population of sufficient size and diversification to support separate centres of residential and commercial activity. |

He acknowledged that he had received from George Hoskinson, free planter of the same island, the sum of £500 0s 0d in good and sufficient bills of exchange to be paid in England before the signing and sealing of the document. He bargained and sold to Hoskinson, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns for ever, a tenement house with thirty acres of land and the provisions growing on it, with all appurtenances, lying at the Little Horse Pasture and formerly held by Gabriel Powell, free planter. The bounds of the parcel were set out more fully elsewhere. He also conveyed twenty acres at the head of Lemon Valley, formerly held by his father Richard Gurling, free planter, since died, with all provisions and appurtenances. He further conveyed twenty thousand yams that lay in a parcel of ground belonging to the heirs of the late Governor Keeling,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

A true copy by John Alexander, register. Richard Gurling, with a seal attached. William and Mary French to Edward Bagley. William French, free planter, together with his wife Mary, made known by these presents that they had received from Edward Bagley, free planter of the island and rightful proprietor, a piece of land of about two acres, extending from the waterfall down to Mrs Crosfield's fence. The parcel was delivered to them in full possession in the presence of the witnesses. The conveyance was made in consideration of Bagley binding himself by these [...] Interpretations The Gurling to Hoskinson conveyance of 12 October 1706 records the highest-value transaction in the records reviewed, with the substantial sum of £500 0s 0d in bills of exchange paid in England for a comprehensive package of property and stock. The transaction reveals the developed financial mechanisms by which large purchases on the island could be settled through instruments payable in London, drawing on the wider commercial system that linked the island to the company's headquarters. The use of bills of exchange instead of island currency or stores credit marks the transaction as belonging to a different financial register, with values denominated in metropolitan terms and payment routed through the international banking system. The composition of the property conveyed extends well beyond bare land and houses to include twenty thousand yams standing in a separate parcel belonging to the heirs of the late Governor Keeling, fifty-five goats, a further animal whose colour or characteristic is unclear in the manuscript, and £10 0s 0d worth of hogs. The inclusion of livestock and standing crops within a single freehold conveyance shows the comprehensive nature of the transaction, in which Gurling was effectively selling Hoskinson an entire farming operation rather than just real property. The yams growing in a parcel belonging to the Keeling heirs indicate that Gurling had cultivation rights on land he did not own, perhaps through a tenancy or sharecropping arrangement with the Keeling estate. The Little Horse Pasture tenement and thirty acres formed the principal real property element of the conveyance, with the parcel identified as formerly belonging to Gabriel Powell. The chain of title from Powell to Gurling presumably ran through the Peak Gult transactions of 1704 in which Powell had sold the twenty acres to Robert Gurling for £100 0s 0d. The current Richard Gurling may be the son or near relative of that Robert Gurling, since the Lemon Valley parcel is identified as formerly held by Richard Gurling the father. The Gurling family had accumulated substantial land across multiple districts by 1706. The twenty acres at the head of Lemon Valley, identified as formerly held by Richard Gurling the elder, since died, indicate an inherited holding now being disposed of by the younger Richard Gurling. The combination of inherited and acquired land within a single sale shows that Gurling was clearing out his entire island estate at one stroke, perhaps in preparation for a permanent departure or for some other major change in |

The use of bills payable in England for the consideration would have supported such a departure, with the proceeds available in London rather than tied to the island. The twenty thousand yams form a remarkable detail of the conveyance. Yams were a staple food crop on the island, used both for human consumption and for feeding livestock, and a stock of twenty thousand represented a substantial agricultural inventory. The yams stood on Keeling land rather than Gurling's own, indicating that Gurling held cultivation rights across multiple parcels with different freehold owners. The transfer of these yams to Hoskinson would have given the buyer immediate access to a major source of food supply for both his household and any livestock he kept. The fifty-five goats and the £10 0s 0d worth of hogs make up the livestock element of the transaction. Goats were well suited to the island's terrain and were a recognised source of meat and milk. The valuation of the hogs at £10 0s 0d in pounds sterling, rather than by head, suggests that the hogs were assessed at market value rather than counted, perhaps because their number or condition varied. The combined livestock holdings indicate that Gurling had operated a substantial pastoral business alongside his cultivation of yams and other crops. The William and Mary French conveyance introduces a different kind of arrangement, in which French and his wife jointly acted as parties to receive a parcel of land from Edward Bagley. The joint participation of husband and wife as receiving parties is unusual within the records, since most conveyances vested property in the husband alone with the wife unmentioned. The naming of Mary French alongside her husband may reflect a specific feature of the arrangement, perhaps that the land was to be held jointly between them or that the consideration was being given by both jointly. The interrupted text prevents a complete understanding of the arrangement, but the joint involvement of the wife stands out as a distinctive feature. The location of the parcel between a waterfall and Mrs Crosfield's fence identifies a small holding defined by physical features rather than by acreage alone. The two-acre extent shows that this was a modest piece of ground, perhaps intended for specific cultivation rather than as a general agricultural holding. The naming of Mrs Crosfield as the holder of the adjoining property establishes another woman as the legal holder of property in her own right, joining the pattern of female landholders that runs throughout the records. The recurrence of Henry Francis and Francis Wrangham as witnesses to the Gurling to Hoskinson conveyance brings them back into the records after their earlier appearance in the Henry Francis quit-claim of January 1704. The connection between these two men appears stable across the period, with both attending major transactions in the island's settler community. Their presence as witnesses to such a high-value transaction shows that they were regarded as suitable formal observers for important deeds. Speculations The very large sum of £500 0s 0d in bills payable in England, combined with the comprehensive nature of the assets sold including land in two districts, twenty thousand yams, livestock and other property, suggests that Richard Gurling was preparing to leave the island permanently. The structure of the payment, routing the proceeds through London rather than retaining them on the island, would have given Gurling resources available wherever he chose to settle next. The complete disposal of his Little Horse Pasture and Lemon Valley holdings, together with all his standing crops and livestock, points |

The £500 0s 0d outlay required significant capital, and the combination of land, crops and livestock would have made him a substantial operator across multiple districts. The transaction completed his progress from the Peak Gult dealings of 1704, in which he had handled twenty acres between £32 0s 0d and £100 0s 0d, to a position as the principal holder of the former Gurling estate at the Little Horse Pasture. The yams held by Gurling on land belonging to the Keeling heirs reveal an arrangement by which cultivation rights and freehold ownership had become separated. Gurling did not own the ground on which his twenty thousand yams stood, but he owned the crop itself. The arrangement was perhaps a tenancy under which Gurling had the right to cultivate the Keeling land in exchange for rent or a share of the produce, or it may have been a more informal use of land that the Keeling heirs had not chosen to bring back into their own working. The transfer of the standing crop to Hoskinson would have carried with it whatever rights Gurling held to remain on the ground until harvest, although the underlying cultivation arrangement would have had to be renegotiated with the Keeling heirs for any future seasons. The naming of Mary French alongside her husband William in the conveyance from Edward Bagley perhaps reflects a specific consideration that involved both spouses, possibly relating to land or money that Mary had brought into the marriage. The joint participation may have been a precaution to ensure that any later claim by Mary against the parcel was foreclosed by her own act as a party to the transaction. The arrangement parallels the careful handling of women's interests in property seen elsewhere in the records, with formal documentation of their roles preventing later disputes about title. |

Thirty acres of this land were known as Box's land and held in proprietary right, and the remaining ten acres belonged to the Right Honourable Company. In return for the two acres delivered by Bagley and his commitment to assist with the enclosure, William and Mary French granted Bagley the right, during Mary French's natural life, to keep up to fifteen head of neat cattle on the forty acres without molestation. The right was to cease if Mary French left the island. If William and Mary French removed from the island, they bound themselves to deliver to Bagley the lease of the ten acres held from the company. Bagley was to be put in as full possession of the lease as the Frenches had held it at the time of their departure. The Frenches bound themselves not to dispose of the lease while they remained on the island. They also promised Bagley the first refusal of the thirty acres held in their own right if they removed from the island, reserving to themselves the right to offer that land at public auction. Bagley was to be reinstated in the two acres below the waterfall on Mary French's death, or on the Frenches' departure from the island, with the choice of paying the price the Frenches granted him the refusal of, or of paying any other person the value of the provisions standing on the land at the time of removal, in the manner customary for gumwood ground. The structure shows how landholders on the island used a single deed to address several different aspects of a longer-term relationship. Bagley delivered two acres of his own land below the waterfall to the Frenches in present possession, and in return received a bundle of future and conditional rights that protected his interest in the wider holding over time. The instrument provides a working example of how the island's conveyancing practice could accommodate sophisticated arrangements within a single document. The terminology of taking in forty acres of land near the High Peak identifies a deliberate act of enclosure, by which the Frenches and Bagley together would convert unimproved or open ground into bounded pasture. Thirty acres were already held in proprietary right and known as Box's land, while the remaining ten acres were leased from the company. The combination of freehold and leasehold within a single working enclosure shows how planters built up viable agricultural units from a mixture of titles. Bagley's commitment to assist with the taking in indicates that enclosure was a labour-intensive task requiring multiple hands, with neighbouring holders contributing effort in exchange for grazing rights or other benefits. The grazing licence granted to Bagley, allowing him to keep up to fifteen head of neat cattle on the forty acres during Mary French's natural life, represents a form of pasturage right separate from the underlying title. The phrase neat cattle refers to bovines as distinguished from sheep, goats, horses and other livestock. Bagley acquired the right to graze his own animals on Frenches' land for the duration of Mary's life, with the right terminating if she left the island. The arrangement allowed Bagley to expand his pastoral capacity without acquiring additional land of his own, while giving the Frenches a quid pro quo for Bagley's two-acre transfer and his enclosure work. The supplementary memorandum, executed on the same day, raised the cattle limit from fifteen to eighteen head and added an obligation for the Frenches to take Bagley's milch cows for their milk before any other person's cows. The memorandum addresses two distinct points that the main deed had failed to cover: a stocking density limit and a priority right for Bagley's milk supply. The Frenches' commitment to take Bagley's cows first reveals that they operated a dairying service for other holders, with their pasture supporting cows owned by neighbours who paid them for the milk. The arrangement gave Bagley a guaranteed market for his cows' milk and the Frenches a steady source of dairy income. |

|                    |                 |                   | The conditional clauses governing the Frenches' departure from the island reveal the legal arrangements used to handle the possibility that holders might leave. If they left, Bagley was to receive the lease of the ten acres held from the company, taking up the Frenches' position with the company as lessee. He was also to have first refusal on the thirty acres of Box's land held in their own right, with the Frenches reserving the right to put the land to public auction. The structure protected Bagley's interests by giving him priority access to the Frenches' assets while preserving the Frenches' right to obtain the best price the market would offer. The reference to gumwood ground identifies a specific type of land on the island characterised by the presence of gumwood trees, a distinctive feature of the local vegetation. The customary practice for gumwood ground involved a particular method of valuing standing provisions at the time of a holder's removal, with the next occupier paying for the crops standing on the land at a value determined by usage. The phrase as is usual in gumwood ground points to an established local custom that the parties could invoke without further specification, indicating a developed body of customary practice surrounding particular types of land on the island. The right of public auction reserved by the Frenches over the thirty acres of Box's land, despite Bagley's first refusal, indicates that the island had a recognised mechanism for selling land at public outcry. The phrase puttick out cry refers to a public auction conducted by open bidding, the standard method for realising the highest price on assets in the period. The reservation allowed the Frenches to test the market for the value of the parcel while still respecting Bagley's preference, since he could match the highest bid to secure the land if he chose. The joint participation of William and Mary French in the conveyance, with both signing and sealing the document, represents an unusual departure from the more common pattern where the husband alone executed property instruments. The arrangement perhaps reflected the original Bagley conveyance to them as joint owners of the waterfall parcel, with the corresponding grant of grazing rights and other benefits requiring both spouses' assent to bind the property. The grazing licence was also explicitly tied to Mary French's life, making her assent essential to the arrangement. The condition that the grazing right would terminate if Mary French left the island, separate from her death, points to the practical importance of personal presence on the island for the operation of such arrangements. The right was tied to her continued residence as well as to her life, perhaps because the supervision of grazing on the land depended on the Frenches' own presence. The conditional nature of the right reveals the high mobility of the settler population and the consequent need for arrangements that adjusted to departures as well as deaths. Speculations The structure of the French to Bagley arrangement perhaps reflects the early stages of the Frenches' eventual departure from the island. The detailed provisions for what would happen if they left, including Bagley's first refusal on the thirty acres and his right to the company lease, suggest that departure was already in contemplation when the deed was drafted. The Frenches may have been planning their eventual return to England or migration elsewhere, with the Bagley arrangement designed to settle their affairs and give a trusted neighbour priority access to their assets when they did go. Bagley's willingness to part with two acres of his own land in exchange for a bundle of conditional and future rights suggests that he valued the long-term |

The grazing right alone, allowing him to keep fifteen or eighteen head of cattle on the forty acres for the duration of Mary French's life, would have given him substantial pastoral capacity over a potentially extended period. Combined with the first refusal on the Frenches' future sale of the freehold and the lease, the arrangement gave Bagley a strong position to expand his interests when the Frenches eventually moved on. The two acres he transferred functioned as the price of admission to this preferential relationship. The dairying arrangement implied by the supplementary memorandum, with the Frenches taking other holders' milch cows for their milk, indicates a specialised function within the island's agricultural economy. The Frenches' forty-acre pasture supported their own livestock and the cows of paying neighbours, generating income from milk production beyond their own household needs. Bagley's negotiated priority right to have his cows taken first ensured that his dairy supply would not be displaced by other holders' animals during periods of high demand on the Frenches' pasture capacity. The arrangement reveals the existence of a small-scale dairy economy on the island in which holders specialised in particular agricultural functions and contracted with each other for services. The William French involved in this 1708 transaction is probably the same William French who appears in the 1703 conveyance of the Oak Gutt parcel to Thomas Goodwin and in the related 1705 transaction involving the Wakefield land. The earlier French was identified as a soldier, while the 1708 deed describes him simply as a free planter, suggesting that he had left military service by the time of this later transaction. The progression from soldier to free planter mirrors the path taken by other men who had crossed from the garrison into the settled civilian population of the island. |

Carne acknowledged that he had received from Orchard the sum of £6 0s 0d in lawful money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the document. He released Orchard, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns from any further claim in respect of the sum. He demised, set and let to Orchard, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a dwelling house and twenty-two acres of land. Ten acres of the holding belonged to the heir of Governor Keeling, since died, and the remaining twelve acres belonged to the Right Honourable Company, leased and taken up by Carne. The land lay in a place known as the Peak Gult. The lease was to run for seven years from the date of the document. During the term Orchard was to pay the company its full rent and the dues imposed on such lands, at the times when they became due. Carne bound himself and his successors to allow Orchard to hold and possess the premises without interruption from any person. Orchard, for his part, undertook not to impoverish the ten acres by cutting wood beyond what was necessary for use, and to leave the premises in as good repair at the end of the lease as they were at the start. Orchard also undertook to keep and look after two turkey hens and one turkey cock belonging to Carne on the land, and to deliver Carne or his order half of any increase from the birds, either when the young birds were fully grown or when Carne required them. Both parties set their hands and seals to the document on the day and year written above.                                                                                                                                                                                  |

The transaction conveyed possession of the dwelling house and twenty-two acres of land for the duration of the term, with Orchard taking up the position of tenant rather than owner. The structure shows that the island's property market accommodated both outright sales and term leases, with leasehold arrangements available for those who could not or did not wish to commit to permanent acquisition. The composite nature of the leased holding, with ten acres held in proprietary right under the heir of the late Governor Keeling and twelve acres held under a lease from the company, parallels the structure of the French and Bagley arrangement of 1708. Both transactions involved working agricultural units assembled from a mixture of freehold and company leasehold land. The Carne household acted as an intermediate party, holding both elements of the package and now subletting the combined holding to Orchard for the seven-year term. The arrangement reveals how planters with access to multiple sources of land could consolidate them into single working units for transfer to others on lease terms. The price of £6 0s 0d for the seven-year lease of a dwelling house and twenty-two acres works out to less than seventeen shillings per acre per year, even ignoring the value of the house. The figure is far below the per-acre purchase prices seen in freehold transactions, which is to be expected for a lease where the underlying title remained with the lessor. The modest sum suggests that the lease was priced to provide Orchard with a working subsistence at a level he could afford from his own resources as an unmarried free planter, rather than a commercial investment requiring substantial returns. The obligation on Orchard to pay the company its rent and dues during the term, in addition to the £6 0s 0d paid to Carne, indicates that the company retained its direct fiscal relationship with the land it owned. The lease from the company to Carne carried a continuing rent obligation that Orchard now assumed for the duration of his sublease. The arrangement preserved the company's revenue stream while allowing the leasehold interest to move between holders through private sublease arrangements. The structure shows how the company's leasehold system fed into a secondary market in subleases that operated alongside the freehold conveyancing. The covenant against wood-cutting beyond necessary use repeats the concern about timber resources seen in the Jeffrey to Kersey memorandum of 1683 and the explicit naming of timber trees in the Savage to Fuller conveyance of 1686. The Orchard lease imposes a more nuanced restriction, permitting cutting for necessary uses but forbidding impoverishment of the land through excessive removal. The clause reflects an accumulated understanding among lessors that tenants might be tempted to extract wood for their own profit at the expense of the long-term value of the leased property. The restriction protected the underlying capital while allowing reasonable working use. The turkey-keeping arrangement is a distinctive feature of the lease, with Orchard taking responsibility for two hens and one cock belonging to Carne and undertaking to deliver half of the resulting young birds. The arrangement is essentially a sharecropping |

Carne retained ownership of the breeding birds and supplied them as part of the leased premises, while Orchard provided the labour of keeping the birds and received half the young as his return. The other half of the young birds went to Carne, providing him with a continuing flow of poultry without further investment of effort. The naming of three specific birds, two hens and one cock, and the careful provision for the disposal of the increase, indicates that turkeys were a valued and identifiable agricultural commodity on the island. The arrangement also reveals the small scale of the poultry economy, with breeding flocks of only a handful of birds being significant enough to warrant detailed contractual provisions. Turkeys would have been a relatively scarce species on St Helena, perhaps brought in from elsewhere and propagated by careful management, accounting for the attention given to their care in the lease. The repair covenant requiring Orchard to leave the premises in as good repair at the end of the lease as at the start applies the standard English leasehold principle that the tenant must return the property to the lessor in its original condition. The clause reflects the lessor's interest in preserving the value of the asset across the term of the lease, with the tenant carrying the obligation to maintain rather than degrade the property. The covenant gave Carne assurance that he would receive the holding back in usable condition at the end of the seven years, ready for further leasing or for his own use. The description of John Orchard as unmarried man marks his status as a single person without dependants, consistent with the unmarried man designation applied to Robert Marsh in the 1705 transactions. The category was legally relevant because it affected the recipient's capacity to act in his own right and the disposition of his estate. An unmarried free planter could take up a lease without the complications of joint marital interests, simplifying the arrangement for both parties. Speculations The seven-year term of the Orchard lease suggests a deliberate choice of duration that gave the lessee time to bring the land into productive use and recover his investment of labour, while not committing the property to a tenant for an indefinite period. The standard English statutory leasehold term of seven years matched a span long enough for meaningful agricultural activity but short enough for the lessor to reclaim the property within a reasonable period. The term also corresponded to the typical horizon over which the value of standing crops and improvements would accumulate, allowing Orchard to capture the benefits of his work during the term without paying a higher price for an extended lease. The Carne household's accumulation of a composite holding at the Peak Gult, combining a freehold parcel from the Keeling heirs with leased company land, points to active acquisition of agricultural assets by the merchant family during the period from 1704 to 1707. George Carne had earlier acquired the small Chapel Valley plot from Richard Gurling and the fifteen Fryer Valley acres from Robert Leach through his wife as attorney. The further Peak Gult holding now leased to Orchard adds another district to the Carne interests, demonstrating a deliberate spread of property across multiple parts of the island. The turkey-keeping clause perhaps reflects a specific business interest of George Carne in the poultry trade. The breeding birds may have been part of a wider Carne enterprise involving the supply of fowl to passing ships or to the island's wealthier households, with Orchard's farm serving as one of several outposts where |

The careful provision for half the increase indicates that the value of the young birds was substantial enough to merit precise contractual terms, fitting a commercial rather than purely subsistence purpose. The reference to the heir of the late Governor Keeling, rather than to the heirs as in the earlier Gurling to Hoskinson conveyance, suggests that the Keeling estate had narrowed by 1707 to a single inheriting party. The earlier references to multiple heirs may have reflected the position immediately after the governor's death, with the estate then resolving through subsequent inheritances or transfers into a single hand. The narrowing of the description from plural to singular points to the working out of the Keeling succession across the early 1700s, with the family's land becoming concentrated in a single successor.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

The payment was for the use of Mrs Ellenor Price and represented her full portion left to her by her mother Ellenor Beale, since died. Chevals was empowered to receive the portion on Ellenor Price's behalf by a letter of attorney dated 4 February 1706. He confirmed that he had received the £50 0s 0d. Signed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Goodwin and William Marsden. A true copy by John Alexander, clerk. William Chevals. Matthew Bazett held ten acres of land in Sheel Valley, joined to the lands of John Mudge and William Toole, free planters, on which he then lived. He had bought the parcel from George Dweight, free planter, with the provisions standing on it, for the sum of £35 0s 0d. The transaction was set out more fully in a bill of sale dated 2 September 1694, witnessed by John Long, Samuel Wrangham, John Sorsney and Charles Steward. The acreage was 10. Bazett also held about five acres in the same Sheel Valley, joined to his own ten acres and to land belonging to Sorring's children. He had bought the parcel from Jonathan Higham, free planter, for the sum of £10 0s 0d. The transaction was set out more fully in a bill of sale dated 19 December 1706. The acreage was 5. Bazett also held a further ten acres at the head of Deep Valley, joined to the land of Thomas Allis, free planter, to the land of Henry Cealls, and to the land of John Poole. He had bought the parcel from Jonathan Mudge, late free planter, since died, for the sum of £40 0s 0d. The acreage was 10. Total: 25 acres. Island of St Helena. Richard Gurling to John Goodwin. Richard Gurling, free planter of the island, made known by these presents that he had received from John Goodwin, late free planter of the same island, since died, the sum of £17 0s 0d in current money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the document. He acknowledged full payment and complete satisfaction. For this consideration and for other good causes, he gave, granted, bargained and sold to John Goodwin's heirs, executors and administrators [...] Interpretations The Chevals receipt of 5 July 1707 records the transfer of a marriage or testamentary portion through the intermediate hands of an attorney. Ellenor Price was the beneficiary of a sum left to her by her mother Ellenor Beale, since died, and William Chevals had been empowered by a letter of attorney of 4 February |

|                    |                 |                   | 1706 to receive the portion on her behalf. The structure shows how women's testamentary interests were administered through attorneys when the beneficiary was not herself in a position to handle the receipt directly. The recurring use of letters of attorney in the records, applied here as it was earlier to Mary Carne and Elizabeth Rhodes, indicates the importance of such instruments in the day-to-day operation of property and inheritance arrangements on the island. The portion of £50 0s 0d that Ellenor Beale left to her daughter is a substantial sum, comparable to the £104 0s 0d that Swallow paid Cole for a Deep Valley mansion house and seventeen acres in 1705 and well above the £35 12s 0d that the Cotgrave household paid Tewdsdale for a Chapel Valley dwelling house in 1694. The figure indicates that Ellenor Beale had been a woman of significant means, capable of leaving a substantial cash legacy to her daughter rather than transferring property in kind. The arrangement reveals the existence of monetary inheritance alongside the more common transfers of land within families on the island. The name Ellenor Beale connects through testamentary descent to the Beale family that featured prominently in the 1682 inquest, where Captain Anthony Beale appeared as the holder of a substantial consolidated estate at the head of Waterfall Valley. Whether the Ellenor Beale of the 1707 receipt was a direct descendant or member of the same family is not specified in the document, but the continuity of the Beale name across a quarter of a century points to the family's persistence within the island's settler population. The Beale household had moved from active land accumulation in the 1680s to the inheritance and transfer of cash portions by the 1700s, suggesting an evolution of the family's economic activities across the generations. The Matthew Bazett accumulation of 25 acres in Sheel Valley and Deep Valley reveals another case of estate-building by a settler whose name has recurred throughout the records as a witness to other transactions. Bazett had served as a witness to the Sensney watercourse grant of 1704, the French to Goodwin Oak Gutt sale of 1703, the Leach to Carne Fryer Valley conveyance of 1705 and the Cole to Swallow Deep Valley sale of 1705. The combination of his active witnessing role with his own property acquisitions indicates that he was a man of standing within the island's circle of literate and propertied settlers. The three Bazett purchases trace a sustained pattern of acquisition across more than twelve years. The first ten acres came from George Dweight in September 1694 at £35 0s 0d, the third ten acres came from Jonathan Mudge at £40 0s 0d on a date not specified in the entry, and the five-acre extension came from Jonathan Higham in December 1706 at £10 0s 0d. The per-acre prices vary significantly across the three transactions, with the Dweight purchase at £3 10s 0d per acre, the Mudge purchase at £4 0s 0d per acre and the Higham purchase at £2 0s 0d per acre. The differences perhaps reflect the relative quality and improvement of the parcels or the bargaining position of the parties at each transaction. Sheel Valley appears here as a named district of the island, distinct from the more familiar Chapel Valley, Fryer Valley, Sarahs Valley, Fishers Valley, Sharks Valley, Lemon Valley and Deep Valley encountered earlier in the records. The valley took its identity from a feature whose precise nature is not clear from the immediate context, but the name shows that the island's topographic vocabulary extended beyond the principal valleys to include smaller drainage features that hosted scattered settler holdings. |

|                    |                 |                   | The reference to Sorring's children as the holders of land adjoining Bazett's five-acre parcel indicates that the children of an earlier holder named Sorring continued to hold their inherited land in their own names. The description does not specify which children or how many, but it shows that minors or young persons could be identified as a group of joint holders in the formal land records. The arrangement parallels the position seen in the Marsh sales of land bequeathed to Robert Marsh during his minority, although in the Sorring case the children appear collectively as the holders rather than through a parent acting on their behalf. The Gurling to Goodwin conveyance for £17 0s 0d, paid by John Goodwin in his lifetime to Richard Gurling, records a transaction whose buyer has since died. The deed in its remaining text identifies John Goodwin as late free planter and directs the conveyance to his heirs, executors and administrators rather than to him personally. The structure shows how property transactions could be completed after the death of the original purchasing party, with the deed being executed in favour of the buyer's estate. The arrangement preserves the validity of the transaction by recognising the buyer's earlier payment and directing the title to those legally entitled to take it up on his behalf. The combination of Higham and Mudge as named sellers of Bazett's later parcels connects to figures who appear elsewhere in the records. Jonathan Higham had bought ten acres in Sharks Valley from Thomas Beurch in earlier transactions recorded in the documents and had sold the small Chapel Valley plot to Robert Bell in 1704. His sale to Bazett of a further five acres in Sheel Valley in 1706 extends the pattern of Higham's property dealings. Jonathan Mudge, since died, may be related to the John Mudge who appears as a Sharks Valley landholder in the 1682 inquest, though the two are not necessarily the same individual. Speculations Matthew Bazett's accumulation of twenty-five acres across two valleys, combined with his recurring role as a witness to other men's transactions, points to his emergence as a substantial figure within the island's settler society by the early 1700s. His purchase of Dweight's ten acres in 1694, followed by additional acquisitions a decade later, suggests a deliberate strategy of acquiring land as opportunities arose and consolidating his position within Sheel Valley while extending into Deep Valley. The combination of literacy, witnessing activity and property accumulation matches the pattern seen with Thomas Goodwin, indicating that a small group of literate settlers used their connections and resources to build up significant estates over time. The differences in per-acre prices across the three Bazett purchases perhaps reflect changing conditions in the island's land market or the particular circumstances of each seller. The £2 0s 0d per acre at which Higham sold the five-acre Sheel Valley extension to Bazett in 1706 is strikingly low compared to the £3 10s 0d and £4 0s 0d rates of the earlier purchases. The lower price may indicate that the Higham parcel was of lesser quality, perhaps with fewer improvements or less established cultivation. The alternative is that Higham was under pressure to sell, with Bazett able to acquire the parcel at a favourable rate because of his neighbouring position and his ability to pay promptly. The same pattern of opportunistic acquisition by neighbouring holders appears throughout the records. The Chevalls receipt connects to the wider Carne business activity recorded across the documents. George Carne's role as a custodian of accounts and effects, demonstrated by the earlier Demallo receipt, extends here to the handling of testamentary portions |

The two parcels lay adjacent to each other near the head of Lemon Valley. Richard Gurling delivered the land, with all appurtenances, to Mr Thomas Goodwin, deputy governor of the island and executor of John Goodwin's last will and testament, for the sole use and benefit of John Goodwin's heir. He bound himself, his heirs, executors and administrators to ensure that Goodwin or the heirs of the late John Goodwin could hold and enjoy the premises without interruption or molestation from him, his successors or any person acting through him. He set his hand and seal to the document on 13 August 1707. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of Matthew Bazett, William Marsden and John Alexander. Richard Gurling, with a seal attached. Island of St Helena. John and Margaret Bagley to Edward Bagley. John Bagley, free planter of the island, together with his wife Margaret Bagley, made known by these presents that they had received from Edward Bagley, free planter of the same island, the sum of £19 0s 0d in current money of the island, paid in hand. They acknowledged full payment and complete satisfaction. For this consideration and for other good causes, they gave, granted, bargained, sold and delivered to Edward Bagley, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a parcel of land of about ten acres, together with a dwelling house and garden. Interpretations The Gurling to Goodwin conveyance of 13 August 1707 reveals an unusual situation in which the buyer had died before the conveyance was formally executed. John Goodwin had paid Richard Gurling £17 0s 0d for the twenty-two acres in his lifetime, but the documentary completion of the sale took place only after his death. Richard Gurling executed the deed in favour of John Goodwin's heir, with Mr Thomas Goodwin acting as executor of John Goodwin's last will and testament to receive the conveyance on the heir's behalf. The structure allowed the buyer's earlier payment to be honoured by transferring the title to those legally entitled to receive it under his estate. The position of Thomas Goodwin as both deputy governor of the island and executor of John Goodwin's will marks the convergence of his administrative role with his family responsibilities. The relationship between Thomas Goodwin and the late John Goodwin is not specified in the document, but the use of the surname and Thomas's position as executor strongly suggests a close family connection, perhaps as brother or as senior relative to the deceased. The arrangement allowed Thomas, who had become the senior figure in the island's administration by 1703 and continued in that role in 1707, to handle the property affairs of his deceased kinsman alongside his official duties. The chain of title for the twenty acres of the Boyce parcel runs back to the John Boyce who appears in the 1682 inquest as the holder of two ten-acre parcels in Lemon Valley, acquired from Milbank and Ferrant through the intermediate hands of James Wakefield. |

|                    |                 |                   | Twenty-five years later, those Boyce parcels had passed through unspecified intermediate transactions into Richard Gurling's possession, from which he now conveyed them on to the Goodwin family. The persistence of the Boyce identification across a quarter of a century points to the durable character of original allotment names within the island's land records, with parcels continuing to be identified by their first holder long after they had moved through multiple hands. The two additional acres formerly belonging to Richard Gurling's father add a smaller adjoining parcel to the conveyance. The combination of twenty acres from one source and two acres from another, lying adjacent to each other near the head of Lemon Valley, fits the pattern of consolidation seen throughout the records, in which working holdings were built up from parcels of different origins lying in proximity to each other. The naming of Gurling's father as the previous holder of the two acres places the parcel within the family's inherited estate, distinct from the Boyce purchase that Richard had acquired in his own right. The price of £17 0s 0d for the twenty-two acres gives a per-acre figure of about fifteen shillings and sixpence, falling well below the £1 2s 0d to £1 13s 4d rates seen in earlier Fryer Valley transactions but slightly above the seven shillings and sixpence per acre at the Little Horsepad in the 1690s. The figure suggests that Lemon Valley land near the head of the valley fell into a middle price range, neither commanding the premiums of established valley parcels nor falling to the lower rates of isolated upland holdings. The John and Margaret Bagley to Edward Bagley conveyance of unspecified date opens with the joint participation of husband and wife as the conveying parties, following the same pattern seen in the William and Mary French to Edward Bagley arrangement of 1708. The joint conveyance perhaps reflects the joint ownership of the parcel by both spouses, or the desire to ensure that any marital interest of the wife was properly conveyed along with the husband's title. The structure protected Edward Bagley against any later claim by Margaret Bagley to a continuing interest in the parcel. The Bagley family connections suggested by the names John, Margaret and Edward Bagley, all appearing in connection with property transactions, indicate the extension of the Bagley household into multiple holdings across the island. The Edward Bagley who appears as the purchaser here is probably the same Edward Bagley who featured in the 1708 arrangement with the Frenches and whose name appears as a witness to the Leach to Carne conveyance of 1705 and the Greentree to Johnson conveyance of 1698. The repeated appearances of Edward Bagley as a purchaser and witness mark him as another active figure within the island's property circles. The price of £19 0s 0d for the ten-acre parcel with dwelling house and garden gives a per-acre figure of £1 18s 0d if the house is treated as having no separate value, or less if the house is valued. The combined price for land and improvements falls between the modest rural rates and the higher urban valuations, fitting a working agricultural holding with an established residence. The presence of both a dwelling house and a garden indicates that the parcel was a fully developed holding suitable for immediate occupation by the new owner. Speculations The death of John Goodwin before the formal execution of the Gurling conveyance suggests that property transactions on the island sometimes proceeded through informal stages of payment and possession before the documentary completion. Buyers might pay the consideration and take effective control |

The risk in such arrangements became apparent when one of the parties died before the formal completion, requiring the heirs or executors to step in and complete the transfer on behalf of the estate. The Gurling to Goodwin conveyance shows how the system accommodated this risk by allowing the seller to execute the deed in favour of the buyer's heir even after the buyer's death. The combined position of Thomas Goodwin as deputy governor, executor of John Goodwin's will and a major property holder in his own right indicates the extent to which family, official and commercial interests overlapped within the island's small settler society. Thomas's accumulation of property recorded in earlier deeds had given him a substantial private estate, and his administrative role placed him at the centre of the island's government. The further responsibility of handling John Goodwin's estate added a family dimension to his already extensive activities, with his name appearing in multiple capacities within the same set of records. The continuing identification of land by reference to former holders many years after their sale, with the Boyce parcels still being so named twenty-five years after the 1682 inquest, points to the persistence of social memory within the small settler population. Even as land moved through multiple hands, the names of original or notable holders remained attached to the parcels as a kind of permanent identification. The practice gave the land records a layered character, with each parcel carrying the imprint of its successive holders over time. The Bagley family's role in property accumulation, both through Edward Bagley's purchases from John and Margaret Bagley and from the Frenches, and through the broader appearances of the Bagley name across the records as witnesses and buyers, suggests a coordinated family strategy of estate-building. Edward may have been the most active acquirer within the family, with other Bagleys playing supporting roles as occasional sellers or witnesses. The pattern of internal family transfers, with John and Margaret selling to Edward, perhaps reflects an arrangement by which assets were being consolidated under one branch or generation of the family while the selling parties received their value in cash. |

The remaining £9 0s 0d was to be paid in Spanish dollars at six shillings per dollar on or before 1 July next following the date of the document. On receipt of these payments, Draper acknowledged that he would be fully satisfied. For this consideration and for other good causes, he gave, granted, bargained, sold and delivered to Samuel Maxwell, corporal, of the same island, a messuage house standing in Chapel Valley near Fort James, joined to the house of Richard Leach, free planter, and to the house of John Stitt, soldier. The conveyance included all appurtenances belonging to the property. Maxwell was to hold the house, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns from the date of the document for ever, on payment of the £18 0s 0d in the manner described. Draper bound himself and his successors to allow Maxwell to hold the property [...] Interpretations The Draper to Maxwell conveyance reveals a distinctive form of consideration on the island, with the £18 0s 0d purchase price split into two halves paid in different forms at different times. The arrangement combined live cattle for half the price with Spanish dollars for the other half, the cattle to be appraised by two impartial men and the dollars to be valued at six shillings per dollar. The structure shows that the island's property market accepted non-monetary consideration alongside cash, with livestock serving as a recognised store of value that could substitute for currency in larger transactions. The use of two appraisers to value the cattle ensured that both parties were protected against arbitrary valuation, with the impartial assessment providing a fair conversion between livestock and the agreed monetary equivalent. The Spanish dollar at six shillings was a recognised standard of currency on the island, alongside the local current money used in most transactions. The Spanish dollar, also known as the piece of eight, was the dominant silver coin in international trade across the Atlantic and Indian Ocean networks of the period, and its acceptance on St Helena reflects the island's position within those trade routes. The conversion rate of six shillings per dollar provided a fixed parity at which the silver coin could be valued in sterling terms for the purposes of the conveyance. The deferred payment structure, with the cattle due by 1 April and the dollars due by 1 July following the conveyance, allowed Maxwell time to assemble the consideration after taking possession of the property. The arrangement effectively provided Maxwell with credit during the months between the conveyance and the payment dates, with Draper accepting the risk of deferred receipt in exchange for the agreed total value. The structure resembles the bond arrangement seen in the Powell to Gurling transaction of 1704, in which Gurling's payment was secured by a bond rather than delivered immediately, although the Draper to Maxwell deed specifies the form of payment in greater detail. The description of the property as a messuage house in Chapel Valley near Fort James places it within an established urban area adjacent to the fortification. The term messuage is the legal term for a dwelling house together with its appurtenant lands and buildings, and its use here marks the property as a complete residential unit rather than just a bare building. The location near Fort James connects the Maxwell purchase to the broader Fort James Valley settlement encountered in the Bowman to Nicholls entry, with multiple recorded houses standing in proximity to the fort and forming a distinct urban cluster on the island. |

|                    |                 |                   | The identification of neighbouring houses by reference to their occupants, Richard Leach the free planter and John Stitt the soldier, follows the standard urban boundary convention seen in the Edmunds to Goodwin Chapel Valley town tenement. The boundary description does not give a frontage measurement or specify the size of the parcel, which suggests that the message was identified more by its position in the row of houses than by precise dimensions. The combination of free planter Leach and soldier Stitt as neighbours reflects the mixed character of the Fort James Valley settlement, with civilian and military occupants holding adjacent properties. The Bagley conveyance of 10 August 1705 fits within the broader pattern of Bagley family property activity recorded across the documents. Edward Bagley's purchase from John and Margaret completed three days before Robert Marsh's confirmation deeds to William Dufton and George Dweight of 9 August 1705, placing two related Bagley transactions and three Marsh transactions within a narrow window. The clustering of activity in early August 1705 suggests that this was a busy period for the island's property dealings, perhaps connected to the seasonal rhythm of the agricultural year or to the gathering of the relevant parties at a particular time. The signature of John Bagley in his own hand, contrasted with Margaret Bagley's mark in the form of an M, reveals the typical mixed literacy of a married couple in the island's settler population. John could write his name, while Margaret could not, a pattern seen in several earlier conveyances where one spouse signed and the other marked. The disparity reflects the unequal access to education between men and women in the period, with literacy in women being rarer than in men of the same social standing. The Maxwell purchase identifies him as a corporal in the garrison, placing him alongside John Hemon, the corporal who appeared as a landholder in earlier records. The willingness of military men of corporal rank to commit substantial sums to property purchases shows that the garrison provided a population with sufficient personal resources to participate actively in the island's land market. A corporal's pay would have accumulated over time into amounts capable of supporting purchases of urban or rural property, and the recorded transactions show that such men did acquire land and houses in their own right alongside the civilian planters. Speculations The structure of the Draper to Maxwell deed, with payment partly in live cattle and partly in Spanish dollars, perhaps reflects the practical realities of the island's monetary economy. Cash currency was limited in quantity, with most settlers holding their wealth in land, livestock and stored provisions rather than in coin. By accepting half the price in cattle, Draper allowed Maxwell to use his accumulated livestock rather than requiring him to convert it into currency before the transaction could complete. The arrangement matched the actual asset composition of the parties to the form of the consideration, reducing the practical difficulties of executing the sale. The reference to two impartial men appraising the cattle indicates that the island had a recognised practice for the valuation of livestock by neutral parties. The system would have functioned through the appointment of two settlers known to both buyer and seller and trusted to provide a fair assessment, perhaps based on visible condition, breeding quality and current market prices for similar animals. The institution of impartial appraisal supports the operation of barter-style transactions within a small community where reputation and trust played important roles in commercial dealings. |

A corporal acquiring a town house would have been positioning himself for a more settled life on the island, perhaps in anticipation of an eventual transition from military service to civilian planter status. The pattern matches those of other soldiers who acquired land and buildings during their service, indicating a regular path by which garrison personnel moved into the island's permanent settler population. The Bagley family's pattern of internal transfers, with John and Margaret selling ten acres to Edward, suggests that Edward was emerging as the principal landholding figure within the family. The arrangement may have reflected a generational settlement in which an older couple was disposing of their working holding to a younger relative who would continue active cultivation, while they received cash to support themselves in their later years. The consolidation of family assets under one branch is a recurring theme in the records, with the Marsh, Bagley and Goodwin families all showing variations on this pattern.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

He acknowledged full payment and complete satisfaction. He gave, granted, bargained, sold and delivered to Des Fountaine, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a parcel of land of about ten acres at the head of Youngs Valley on the east of the island. The parcel was the upper ten acres formerly held by John Mathews, late free planter, since died. Des Fountaine was to hold the ten acres, with his heirs, for ever, to dispose of at his own will and pleasure. Dixon bound himself and his successors to allow Des Fountaine to hold and enjoy the premises without any claim, challenge, demand, interruption or contradiction from him, his heirs, executors, administrators, assigns or any other person acting through him. He set his hand and seal to the document on 24 November 1701. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of Joseph Trapp, Joseph Parsons and John Alexander. Thomas Dixon, with a seal attached. Interpretations The Dixon to Des Fountaine conveyance of 24 November 1701 records a property transaction between two members of the garrison, with Dixon as sergeant and Des Fountaine as soldier. The military ranks of both parties show that the garrison's personnel were active participants in the island's land market both as buyers and as sellers. A sergeant disposing of his ten-acre holding to a private soldier indicates that the property market reached down through the ranks, with men of different service grades capable of accumulating sufficient resources to acquire land in their own right. |

|                    |                 | Sealed Signed &amp; Deliv[d] in the presence of us Jo[s]Trapp Jo[s] Parsons Jn[o] AlexanderTho[s] Dixon [seal] | The price of £10 0s 0d for ten acres at the head of Youngs Valley gives a per-acre figure of £1 0s 0d, the same rate as the Robert Marsh to William Dufton confirmation deed of 1705 and the John Cotgrave to Elizabeth Rhodes Sharks Valley transaction. The figure points to a stable per-acre value for valley-head land of moderate quality across the late 1690s and early 1700s, with parcels in this category trading consistently at £1 0s 0d per acre regardless of the specific location. The Mathews allotment at the head of Youngs Valley connects back to the 1682 inquest, in which John Mathews appears as the holder of twenty acres in Youngs Valley joined on the east to ten acres formerly held by Owen Ockwin and on the west to the head of Youngs Valley. By 1701 those original twenty acres had split, with the upper ten acres now being conveyed by Dixon to Des Fountaine. The fragmentation of the original Mathews allotment into smaller working parcels and its passage into the hands of garrison men follows the broader pattern by which seventeenth-century settler holdings dispersed across the early eighteenth century. The phrase on the east of the said Island, used to identify the location of the Mathews parcel, places Youngs Valley within the geographical orientation of the island. The reference suggests that the island was navigated and described by reference to its principal compass directions, with valleys identified by their position on one side or another. The orientation matches the references in earlier records to the East Ridge as a recurring boundary feature, indicating that the eastern part of the island formed a recognised geographical area within the settler vocabulary. The use of the name Samuel Des Fountaine in this conveyance, with its French-style construction including the article, suggests a settler of French origin or descent. The surname pattern indicates that the garrison drew personnel from beyond the English population alone, including men whose family origins lay in continental Europe. The recording of his name in the formal register without comment or special notation shows that such non-English settlers were absorbed into the island's documentation on the same terms as English-born residents, with their distinctive names preserved in the record as a marker of their background. The Draper to Maxwell conveyance was completed on 29 November 1699, just over two years before the Dixon to Des Fountaine transaction of November 1701. The two deeds together establish that the period 1699 to 1701 saw active property transfers involving military personnel, with corporal Maxwell acquiring a Chapel Valley house from a free planter and soldier Des Fountaine acquiring a Youngs Valley parcel from a sergeant. The pattern shows the steady incorporation of garrison men into the island's permanent landholding population during these years. The witnesses to the Dixon conveyance, Joseph Trapp, Joseph Parsons and John Alexander, include two men who do not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed. Trapp and Parsons join the small group of witnesses who authenticated property transactions on the island during this period, alongside the recurring figures of Alexander, Bazett, Hoskinson and others. The witnesses' identities are not further specified in the document, but their presence indicates the involvement of additional literate men in the formal record-keeping beyond those most frequently encountered in the earlier deeds. Speculations The price of £10 0s 0d that Des Fountaine paid Dixon for the upper ten acres of the Mathews allotment falls within the range that a soldier could plausibly have accumulated from his service pay. The sum is comparable to amounts paid by other garrison men for |

The recurring participation of garrison men as buyers indicates that the company's pay system, despite its limitations, provided enough surplus over basic needs to allow some men to enter the property-owning class. Dixon's decision to sell his upper ten acres in Youngs Valley, while presumably retaining other holdings or returning to a position without land on the island, may reflect a transition in his personal circumstances. Sergeants were senior soldiers who often spent extended periods in the same posting, accumulating property during their service. Dixon's sale to a junior soldier of his own service may have arranged a transfer of an established holding to a member of his unit, preserving the land within the military community even as Dixon moved on to other arrangements. The transaction follows the pattern by which property circulated within the garrison alongside its movement between civilian planters. The persistence of the Mathews identification of the upper ten acres, twenty years after John Mathews had appeared as the original allottee in the 1682 inquest, points again to the durable character of original holder names within the island's land records. The Mathews allotment had divided into upper and lower parts and passed through unspecified intermediate hands before reaching Dixon, but the conveyance still identified the parcel by its first holder's name. The naming convention provided a stable historical anchor for parcels that had moved through multiple subsequent transactions. The arrival of Samuel Des Fontaine as a property holder in the records, with his recognisably French name, hints at the broader recruitment of the East India Company's garrison from continental as well as English populations. The seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries saw substantial migration of French Huguenots to England following the Edict of Fontainebleau of 1685, and some of these refugees and their descendants found their way into the company's service. Des Fontaine's presence on St Helena may reflect this wider movement, with his settlement on the island contributing to the diversification of its population beyond its predominantly English settler base. |

The land had formerly been held and occupied by John Stevens, planter, of the same island. The conveyance included all appurtenances. Casthope was to hold the house and land, with his heirs, executors and administrators, for ever, without any claim, challenge or demand. Pratt promised on behalf of himself and his successors that the premises would be free from all encumbrances at the time Casthope entered into possession. Pratt set his hand and seal to the document on the day and year written above. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Naorne and Pomon Whaley, who made his mark in the form of a P. Joseph Pratt, with a seal attached. Interpretations The Goodwin to Hoskinson memorandum of 16 December 1707 confirms Thomas Goodwin's elevation to the office of governor of the island, the highest position within the company's establishment on St Helena. The progression of his designations across the records, from soldier and witness in the 1680s through gunner's mate in 1694, deputy storekeeper in 1696, captain, deputy governor and storekeeper in 1703, gentleman in the Bevan transfer of 1705, deputy governor and executor in 1707, and now governor with the courtesy of esquire, traces a sustained rise through the company's hierarchy that culminated in the senior governorship. The memorandum documents him at the peak of his career on the island. The wood reservation in the Goodwin to Hoskinson sale establishes a divided interest in the parcel, with the underlying land passing to Hoskinson while Goodwin retained the right to dispose of the standing wood. Hoskinson was permitted to cut wood only where he planted, presumably to clear ground for cultivation, but could not sell or fell wood for any other purpose. Goodwin and his successors retained the right to enter the parcel and remove the wood at their own discretion. The arrangement transfers the agricultural value of the land to Hoskinson while preserving the timber value as a separate property right held by Goodwin. The clause demonstrates how the island's conveyancing practice could separate different attributes of a single parcel into distinct property rights vested in different parties. The William French previously identified as holding the ten acres connects this transaction to the William French of the earlier records, who had sold the Oak Gutt parcel to Goodwin in 1703 and entered into the joint arrangement with Bagley in 1708. The reference here to French as the former holder, with Goodwin now selling the parcel on to Hoskinson, indicates that Goodwin had acquired the land from French at some point between French's 1703 sale of the Oak Gutt parcel and this 1707 onward sale. The Goodwin estate had therefore continued to grow during the early years of his governorship, with new acquisitions feeding the pool of parcels he could in turn dispose of to others. The price of £24 0s 0d for the ten acres, with wood reserved, gives a per-acre figure of £2 8s 0d. The figure stands above the £1 0s 0d to £1 2s 0d per acre range seen in earlier transactions for valley-head land, even with the wood reservation reducing the value of the parcel by removing the timber from the transferred interest. The higher rate suggests that the parcel was of better quality or that the price reflected the appreciation of land values on the island into the late 1700s. The wood reservation indicates that the underlying timber was of substantial value, sufficient to make a separate reservation worthwhile rather than including it in the sale price. |

|                    |                 |                   | The reference to page 55 of the same book identifies the official register kept by the council clerk as the source of the original conveyance from French to Goodwin. The cross-reference shows that the island's land records had reached a level of internal organisation by 1707 that allowed conveyances to be located by page number within the register. The clerk who maintained the book provided not only the certifying signature on each individual deed but also the framework of pagination that allowed earlier transactions to be cited as authoritative records in subsequent documents. The Pratt to Casthope conveyance of 13 July 1687 represents one of the earliest dated deeds in the records reviewed, falling between the Jeffrey to Kersey conveyance of November 1683 and the Savage to Fuller conveyance of March 1686. The transaction conveyed ten acres with a house, formerly held by John Stevens, from Pratt to Casthope for £11 0s 0d. The price gives a per-acre figure of £1 2s 0d for land with improvements, similar to the per-acre rates that would emerge in the Fryer Valley transactions of the 1690s and indicating that valley-quality land carried consistent prices across the late seventeenth century. The 1687 transaction places James Casthope in the island's land market several years before he appears as the buyer of the Sarahs Valley parcel from Thomas Harper in March 1694. The earlier purchase of the ten acres from Pratt establishes that Casthope was active as a property holder from 1687 onward, with his accumulation of land progressing through multiple decades. The Casthope identified as soldier in the 1694 Harper conveyance is presumably the same man, indicating that his property activities continued alongside his military service across this period. The dating clause of the Pratt to Casthope deed, in the third year of the reign of King James the Second, anchors the document to the regnal calendar in the same way as the Savage to Fuller conveyance of March 1686. The two deeds together show that island scribes consistently used regnal years as part of the formal dating, with the practice continuing through the brief reign of James II until the joint reign of William and Mary that began in 1689. The encumbrance warranty in the Pratt deed, by which Pratt promised that the premises would be free from all encumbrances at the time of Casthope's entry, provides an early example of the standard clause that became routine in later conveyances. The warranty protected the buyer against mortgages, leases, life interests or other charges that might have attached to the parcel and that could have undermined the new owner's enjoyment of the land. The clause shifted the risk of undisclosed encumbrances from the buyer to the seller, allowing Casthope to take possession with confidence that the parcel was clear of competing claims. Speculations Thomas Goodwin's continuing accumulation and disposal of property during his governorship suggests that he treated his official position as compatible with active commercial dealing in the island's land market. As governor he held the highest local authority over the company's affairs, including its land grants and exchanges, while at the same time engaging in private transactions on his own account. The combination of public and private roles raises questions about the boundary between official function and personal interest, although the records reviewed contain no suggestion that contemporaries regarded the arrangement as improper. The pattern matches the earlier behaviour of company officials such as Governor Keeling, whose land was identified by name in subsequent conveyances, indicating that governors |

The standing wood on a single ten-acre parcel was worth enough to justify a separate reservation rather than simple inclusion in the sale price, indicating that the island's timber stocks had become scarce relative to demand. The arrangement allowed Goodwin to retain a continuing source of valuable material from a parcel he was otherwise selling, perhaps to supply his own household, to use in his administrative role, or to sell to others for the construction and repair of buildings. The clause illustrates how scarce resources could be carved out of a primary property interest and retained by the original holder even after the land itself had been transferred. The Pratt to Casthope transaction of 1687 illustrates how the second generation of settlers, taking over from the original allottees of the 1660s and 1670s, was building up land through purchase from earlier holders. John Stevens had held the ten acres before Pratt, and Pratt was now selling them on to Casthope. The chain of sequential ownership shows that even parcels that had moved once through the market were available for further transfer, with the island's land circulating actively among its settler population. The recurring transactions across decades produced an interconnected web of property relationships that bound the settlers into a single working community of holders and dealers.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

Casthope acknowledged that he was to receive the sum of £30 0s 0d in current money of the island and a further £20 0s 0d in store pay. The payment was to be made in three instalments. The first £10 0s 0d was to be paid at the signing of the document. The second £10 0s 0d was to be paid on the arrival of the first ship coming directly from England, or in six months from the date of the document. The third and final £10 0s 0d was to be paid within three years from 24 March 1694. For this consideration, Casthope bargained, sold, gave, granted and delivered to Wells, his heirs, executors, administrators and successors, a parcel of land of about ten acres with a dwelling house standing on it. The land had formerly been held and occupied by Joseph Pratt and was then in Casthope's own possession. The conveyance included all appurtenances, all the plantations belonging to the land, and the fruits and provisions standing on it. Wells was to hold the house and land, with his successors, for ever, without any hindrance, claim, challenge or demand. The ten acres were bounded as set out more fully in the council books of the island. Casthope bound himself and his successors to ensure that the premises would be free from all encumbrances at the time of Wells's entry. He set his hand and seal to the document on 24 March 1694, computing the year by the use of the Church of England, in the sixth year of the reign of William and Mary, King and Queen of England, France and Ireland. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Nairne and John Worrall. The words "the other twenty in store pay" were included as an interlineation between the fifth and sixth lines of the document. James Casthope made his mark in the form of an X, with a seal attached. |

|                    |                 | Six hundred and Ninety three years and the Sixt[h] Year of the Raigne of our Sovereign William and Marry of England, ffrance and Ireland King and Queen Signed Sealed and Deliv[d] in the presence of (these words the other twenty in Store pay are included between the Fifth and Sixt Lene)Thomas Nairne John Worrallhis James X Casthope [seal] Marke | Interpretations The Casthope to Wells conveyance of 24 March 1694 traces the next stage in the history of the ten-acre Stevens parcel, which Pratt had sold to Casthope in 1687 for £11 0s 0d and which Casthope was now selling on to Wells for a total of £50 0s 0d in cash and store pay. The increase from £11 0s 0d to £50 0s 0d over the seven-year holding period represents an approximately fourfold increase in value, with the parcel either having seen substantial improvement during Casthope's ownership or having appreciated sharply through general inflation in island land values. The composite figure of cash and store pay also indicates that the price drew on different categories of value rather than being a straightforward currency transaction. The split between £30 0s 0d in current money and £20 0s 0d in store pay reveals a sophisticated valuation system that distinguished between immediately spendable currency and credit at the company stores. Store pay was credit available against goods supplied by the company's stores, redeemable in provisions, cloth, tools and other commodities at the prices the stores charged. The arrangement allowed parties to denominate parts of a transaction in different forms of value, with cash and store credit serving different purposes within the household economy. The buyer would have valued store pay if his household needed company-supplied goods, while the seller would have accepted it if he expected to spend it on similar items. The phased payment structure across three years, with £10 0s 0d at signing, £10 0s 0d on the next ship from England or within six months, and the final £10 0s 0d within three years, points to a credit arrangement that gave Wells substantial time to assemble the full purchase price. The reference to the next ship from England as a payment trigger indicates that ship arrivals were significant economic events that brought cash or goods into the island's economy and gave settlers the means to settle accumulated obligations. The structure also suggests that Wells's resources were tied to such arrivals, perhaps through goods he expected to receive or sell when the ship came in. The interlineation noted at the foot of the document, with the words "the other twenty in store pay" included between the fifth and sixth lines, shows the careful documentation of alterations to the deed text. The clerk recording the deed identified the precise location of the inserted words to prevent later disputes about whether the store pay element was part of the original agreement or a subsequent addition. The practice reveals an attention to documentary integrity that would protect both parties against any later challenge to the validity of the deed. The dating clause of the Casthope to Wells deed places the transaction on 24 March 1694, the day before Lady Day, the start of the new year by old style reckoning. The use of the year 1694 alongside the regnal year of William and Mary, the sixth, indicates that the scribe was using the modern convention of treating the year as continuous across Lady Day, since 24 March 1693 by old style would be 24 March 1694 by new style. The explicit reference to the computation of the Church of England suggests that the document was being careful to identify which calendar reckoning it used, perhaps because the date fell so close to the change of year that confusion could arise. The Casthope to Wells conveyance of 24 March 1694 falls three days before the Harper to Casthope conveyance of 27 March 1694, in which Casthope acquired the Sarahs Valley parcel from Harper. The close timing of the two transactions, with Casthope selling one parcel and buying another within a four-day period, points to a deliberate substitution of holdings around the change of year. Casthope was perhaps using |

The persistence of marks rather than signatures across his recorded transactions indicates that he remained illiterate throughout his property dealings, despite his evident success as an accumulator and disposer of land. The case shows that literacy was not a prerequisite for active participation in the island's property market, although it did require the assistance of literate witnesses and clerks to handle the documentary side of transactions. The reference to the council books of the island as the source of the precise boundary description provides another instance of the cross-referencing system that linked individual deeds to the central administrative record. The arrangement spared the parties the labour of restating boundary descriptions in each deed, with the official record providing the authoritative source on which both seller and buyer could rely. The reference works in the same way as the citation of page 55 in the Goodwin to Hoskinson memorandum of December 1707, indicating an established practice of pointing readers to the council books for detailed information not reproduced in the conveyance itself. The inclusion of all the plantations, fruits and provisions standing on the land within the conveyance follows the pattern seen in many earlier deeds. The transfer covered not only the bare land and the house but the entire working substance of the holding at the moment of conveyance, with growing crops and other improvements passing to the new owner as part of the package. The structure ensured that Wells acquired a fully operational holding ready for immediate use rather than an empty parcel requiring fresh cultivation. Speculations The fourfold increase in the value of the Stevens parcel between Pratt's sale to Casthope in 1687 at £11 0s 0d and Casthope's sale to Wells in 1694 at £50 0s 0d reflects either a substantial program of improvement by Casthope during his ownership or a general appreciation of island land values during the period. Casthope had perhaps invested in the dwelling house, the plantations, the hedges and the other improvements over his seven years of holding, converting the parcel from a basic working holding into a more developed property worth a considerably higher price. The fruits and provisions standing on the land at the time of the 1694 conveyance suggest active cultivation that would have added value beyond the bare land and structures. The decision to take part of the price in store pay perhaps reflects Casthope's own anticipated expenditure on company-supplied goods in the years following the sale. Store pay was useful for those whose households consumed substantial quantities of imported commodities, since the credit could be drawn down against actual purchases at the stores. By accepting £20 0s 0d in store pay alongside £30 0s 0d in cash, Casthope structured his receipt to match his expected pattern of expenditure, with the cash portion available for transactions outside the store system and the credit portion reserved for store purchases. The arrangement reflects the integrated character of the island's economic life, in which company supply and private exchange operated as complementary channels. The close timing of Casthope's sale to Wells on 24 March 1694 and his purchase from Harper on 27 March 1694 suggests that Casthope was managing a |

The two transactions, separated by just three days, exchanged one holding for another and may have been negotiated together to align the financial flows. The Harper purchase price of £30 0s 0d was matched by the first cash instalment of £10 0s 0d from Wells and the prospect of further payments, suggesting that Casthope had built confidence in the Wells transaction to the point of being able to commit to the Harper acquisition. The repeated appearance of Ripin Wells in the records, with his name as Rippon Wells when he served as a witness to the Crosby to Goodwin conveyance of 19 March 1695, identifies him as another figure in the active circle of island property dealers during the 1690s. His acquisition of the Stevens-Pratt-Casthope ten acres in March 1694 established him as a landholder in his own right, and his subsequent service as a witness in 1695 places him among the literate participants in the conveyancing process. The combination of buying property and witnessing other transactions follows the pattern seen with Goodwin, Bazett, Hoskinson and others, indicating that active settlers participated across multiple roles within the island's small property community.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

Morris acknowledged that he had received the sum of £9 0s 0d in full payment. He demised, granted, bargained and sold to Wells, his heirs and assigns for ever, a house standing at the upper end of St James Valley. The original agreement had been made in 1687, although the formal indenture was executed only at the present date. Morris bound himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns to allow Wells and his successors to hold, occupy and enjoy the house without any lawful hindrance, molestation, disturbance or eviction from any person claiming through them. He set his hand and seal to the document on the day and year first written above. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Arthur Bradley and Edward Crosby. Michael Morris made his mark in the form of an M M. Richard Swallow to Margaret Sech. Richard Swallow, free planter of the island of St Helena, addressed all Christian people who might come to see the document and sent greeting. He explained the background to the transaction. He was the son and heir apparent of Margaret Sech by her former husband Richard Swallow, since died. He held a right of reversion to the house in which Margaret Sech then dwelt in the country and to seventy acres of land belonging to it, lying in Chapel Valley. On her death, the property would descend immediately to him. Margaret Sech had since had several children by her later husband Richard Sech. To prevent disputes among the children of both marriages, and for the benefit of all Richard Sech's children, she had decided to purchase the property for Richard Swallow's interest in it, acting on her own initiative as executor to her late husband Sech and with the advice and approval of friends, particularly Stephen Poirier, esquire, then governor of the island. Richard Swallow acknowledged that he made the conveyance for the love, affection and good will he bore his mother and her Sech children, and for the sum of £140 0s 0d in current money of the island. The payment was to be made in two parts. The first £70 0s 0d was already paid in hand, in respect of which Richard |

The second £70 0s 0d [...] Interpretations The Morris to Wells indenture of 18 October 1701 records the formalisation of a property transaction that had originally been agreed in 1687, fourteen years before the document was executed. The opening reference to the 1687 agreement, followed by the present-tense conveyance of 1701, shows that the parties had operated under an earlier informal arrangement and now wished to put it on a documentary footing. The structure reveals how property transactions on the island could proceed through long periods of informal possession before reaching their formal written record, with the eventual deed serving as confirmation of an existing state of affairs rather than as the moment of transfer itself. The St James Valley location of the Morris house places the property within the same area as the Fort James Valley settlement encountered in earlier records. The slight variation in naming, with St James Valley and Fort James Valley both appearing in the records, suggests that the valley around the fortification could be referred to by either form, with the prefix referring either to the saint or to the fort named after King James. The upper end of the valley, identified as the location of the Morris house, was perhaps a residential extension above the principal cluster of buildings around the fort itself. The price of £9 0s 0d for a single house at the upper end of St James Valley falls below the typical price for properties in the Chapel Valley town tenements but corresponds with the modest valuations of small urban or peri-urban dwellings on the island. The figure is similar to the £5 0s 0d that Bell paid Higham for the small Chapel Valley plot adjoining his existing house in 1704 and well below the £20 0s 0d that Nicholls paid Bowman for the Fort James Valley dwelling house. The variation across these urban transactions points to a range of property types and qualities within the St James and Chapel Valley settlements, with prices reflecting size, condition and location. Ripon Wells's progression from planter in the 1694 Casthope conveyance, to witness in the 1695 Crosbey deed under the form Rippon Wells, to corporal in the 1701 Morris transaction, traces his movement between civilian and military roles in the island's establishment. The military designation in 1701 may reflect his enlistment in the garrison during the intervening years, or it may indicate that he had carried military rank alongside his planter status throughout the period. The combination of property holding and military service was a regular feature of the island's settler life, with individuals moving between or combining the two roles. The Richard Swallow to Margaret Sech conveyance of unspecified date marks a distinctive type of family settlement, in which Richard Swallow as heir apparent agreed to sell his reversionary interest in his mother's life estate. The transaction did not transfer immediate possession of any property, since Margaret Sech retained her current life interest in the house and the seventy acres. Instead, it transferred Richard's expectant right to inherit on her death, allowing the property to be redirected to her children by her second husband Richard Sech rather than passing automatically to Richard Swallow as her son by her first marriage. The arrangement converted the entire seventy-acre Chapel Valley estate and its house into a fund for the benefit of the Sech children, with Richard Swallow receiving £140 0s 0d in exchange for relinquishing his future inheritance. The price of £140 0s 0d is the second-highest sum recorded in any of the transactions reviewed, exceeded |

The figure reflects the substantial value of the seventy acres in Chapel Valley with a dwelling house, even though Richard Swallow was selling only his future interest in the property rather than immediate possession. The size of the price indicates that the property was a major estate within the island's Chapel Valley district and that the reversionary right to inherit it was considered to have substantial present value notwithstanding the contingency on Margaret Sech's death. The reference to Stephen Poirier, esquire, as the present governor places the transaction during his tenure in that office. Poirier's appearance in the document as the source of advice and approval for the family arrangement points to a continuing involvement of the governor's office in significant property matters on the island, particularly those involving complex family interests or substantial values. The use of an esquire designation for Poirier, similar to the designation of Thomas Goodwin in the 1707 memorandum, follows the convention by which the governor's office carried this elevated formal style. The arrangement reveals a sophisticated approach to managing the consequences of remarriage on inheritance expectations. Margaret Sech's two marriages had produced children by both husbands, with the son of the first marriage holding the heir's expectancy in the property she had brought to or accumulated during her marriage to the first Richard Swallow. The Sech children by her second husband had no claim on this property under the ordinary rules of inheritance, since they were not descendants of the first Swallow. The transaction restructured the family arrangement by buying out the Swallow heir's expectancy so that the property could be redirected to the Sech children, eliminating the inequality that the standard rules of inheritance would have produced. The role of Margaret Sech as executor to her late husband Richard Sech, mentioned as part of the framing of the transaction, indicates that she held legal authority over the Sech estate and was actively managing the interests of her children by him. The combination of her life interest in the Swallow property and her executorship of the Sech estate gave her standing to negotiate with her son Richard Swallow for the buyout of his reversionary interest. The transaction shows how a widow could play a central role in restructuring family property to address the consequences of successive marriages. Speculations The long delay between the 1687 agreement and the 1701 formalisation of the Morris to Wells transaction perhaps reflects either a deliberate decision to delay documentation or some external trigger that prompted both parties to put the matter on a formal footing in 1701. The intervening fourteen years would have seen Wells in possession of the house under an informal arrangement, with the eventual formalisation perhaps tied to his change of status to corporal or to some other event that made documentary protection desirable. The case illustrates that property in the island's urban settlements could change hands through informal arrangements that were eventually recorded only when circumstances required. Margaret Sech's decision to use her own resources to buy out her son Richard Swallow's reversionary interest, rather than allowing the property to pass to him on her death and trusting him to make appropriate provision for his half-siblings, points to a desire to secure a definite outcome for her younger children. By converting the reversionary expectancy into a present payment to Richard Swallow, she removed the risk that he might fail to provide adequately for the Sech children |

The arrangement gave her clear control over the eventual distribution by changing the legal framework while she still had the authority to do so. The involvement of Stephen Poirier as governor in advising on the family arrangement suggests that significant property restructurings within settler families could attract attention from the highest level of the company's administration. The governor's role may have been simply that of a respected senior figure whose advice was sought informally, but it points to the close connection between official authority and private affairs on the small island. Poirier's approval would have lent weight to the arrangement and may have helped to head off any later challenge by other family members or interested parties. The very substantial sum of £140 0s 0d paid for the reversionary interest indicates that the seventy-acre Chapel Valley estate was a major asset, perhaps one of the larger family holdings on the island. The estate's combination of size and central location, together with its house, would have made it a focal point for the household and a substantial inheritance for whoever eventually received it. The willingness of Margaret Sech and her Sech children to commit such a sum to securing the eventual descent points to the importance attached to keeping the estate within the favoured branch of the family, with the financial cost outweighed by the assurance of an undisputed succession.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

He acknowledged full payment. He gave, granted, bargained and sold to French, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a messuage house or tenement in which John Hemont, free planter of the island, had lately dwelt. Heath had bought the property from Hemont for valuable consideration at the time of Hemont's departure from the island. The property lay next to Heath's own plantation. The conveyance also included a parcel of land of about seven and a half acres, bordering the lands of Ripon Wells, John Alexander and Thomas Burnham. French was to hold the house and seven and a half acres of land, with his heirs and assigns, for ever. Heath bound himself and his successors to allow French to hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the house and land freely and quietly without [...] Interpretations |

The total consideration of £140 0s 0d is also subject to a sharp internal contradiction within the documents reviewed, since the seventy acres mentioned in the opening of the conveyance are converted to twenty acres in the operative grant. The discrepancy points to either a copying error in the recording of the deed or a deliberate narrowing of the property included in the actual conveyance, with the seventy acres serving as the description of the wider family estate and the twenty acres representing the specific parcel transferred. The text as recorded leaves this matter unresolved. The recording of two interlineations in the memorandum, with the inserted phrases identified by position within the document, reveals the same careful attention to documentary alterations seen in the earlier Casthope to Wells deed. The recording of "the said Sech's" and "and being Executor to the said Rich's" as inserted phrases before the sealing of the deed shows that the council clerk who certified the document was identifying every textual change to prevent later disputes about authenticity. The practice gives confidence that the text as recorded reflects the agreement reached by the parties and ratified at the moment of execution. Stephen Poirier's signature as a witness to the Swallow to Sech conveyance, alongside Daniel Griffeth as clerk of the council, places the governor himself directly as a witness to the deed rather than merely as an advisor in the background. The combination of governor and council clerk as witnesses gives the deed the highest possible weight of official confirmation, suggesting that the family arrangement was treated as a matter of public significance warranting the personal involvement of the senior officials. The settlement of a substantial estate among the children of a twice-married widow would have been the kind of matter on which the governor's witness was especially valuable. The phrase her heirs by the said John Sech, used to identify the beneficiaries of the conveyance, reveals an apparent shift in the children's father's name from Richard Sech to John Sech across the two parts of the document. The opening of the deed identifies Margaret Sech's late second husband as Richard Sech, while the operative grant directs the property to her heirs by John Sech. The variation may reflect a clerical error in one or other use of the name, or it may indicate that John Sech was an alternative form of the same person's name. The text does not resolve the question, but the intention to direct the property to the children of the second marriage is clear. The Heath to French conveyance is dated by reference to the recipient's office as chief gunner of the garrison of Fort James. The designation places John French at the head of the gunnery department of the principal fortification on the island, a senior military position equivalent to the master gunner in other garrisons. The chief gunner would have been responsible for the artillery, the powder stores and the training of the gunners, holding a position of substantial trust within the company's military establishment. French's acquisition of a substantial property at this date reflects his standing as an officer with the resources to make significant private investments. The price of £50 0s 0d for the house and seven and a half acres gives a per-acre figure of about £6 13s 0d for the land if the house is treated as having no separate value, or much less per acre if the house carries substantial value. The high per-acre rate, even before allowing for the value of the building, places the parcel firmly in the upper end of the island's land market. The |

Heath had bought the property from John Hemont at the time of Hemont's departure from the island, with the timing of the original purchase tied to the seller's exit rather than to any other event. The structure shows that planters preparing to leave the island would dispose of their property to neighbouring holders or other available buyers, with the timing of the sale dictated by their travel plans rather than by the seasonal rhythm of the agricultural year. Heath had positioned himself to take advantage of Hemont's departure to acquire an adjacent parcel that complemented his existing plantation, and was now passing it on to French at the moment when he in turn was ready to release the property. The identification of three neighbouring holders, Ripon Wells, John Alexander and Thomas Burnham, as the bordering proprietors places the parcel within an established neighbourhood of property dealings recorded across the materials reviewed. Wells appears earlier as the purchaser of the Stevens-Pratt-Casthope ten acres in March 1694 and as the recipient of the Morris house in 1701. Alexander appears repeatedly as a witness, register and copyist. Burnham appears in the 1682 inquest as the holder of twenty acres in Fishers Valley bordering the parcel that Bishop exchanged with Leach. The presence of all three as boundary holders suggests that the parcel lay in a long-settled district where the surrounding properties had been held by the same families across two decades or more. Speculations The double calendar reference in the Swallow to Sech conveyance, with the deed dated 4 February 1705 and the second instalment due on 25 March 1706, perhaps reflects a deliberate use of Lady Day as the payment date because it was the start of the new year by old style reckoning. The selection of the new year's day as the trigger for the second payment may have allowed Margaret Sech to align the payment with her own income flows, perhaps with rents or other receipts that came due at quarter days. The timing also gave her over a year to assemble the £70 0s 0d remainder, with the year and a quarter between execution and second payment matching the typical horizon for such arrangements. The substantial price of £140 0s 0d that Margaret Sech paid for her son's reversionary interest in the Chapel Valley estate suggests that the property was valuable enough to justify a significant commitment from her own resources or from those of the Sech family. The decision to undertake the transaction now, while she was alive and able to direct the outcome, rather than relying on Richard Swallow's promise to provide for his Sech half-siblings after her death, indicates a strong determination to secure a definite result. The legal mechanism converted an uncertain future arrangement into a present cash transfer, eliminating the risk that Richard Swallow might fail to honour informal commitments after gaining full possession on his mother's death. The presence of Edward Heath as a substantial property accumulator emerges across multiple records. Heath had received ten acres from the company in Peak Gult in exchange for the ten acres formerly held by Samuel Jeffrey, as recorded in the Hoskinson to Powell conveyance of 1704. He now appears as the seller of a different parcel including a house and seven and a half acres to John French in this conveyance. The two |

The chief gunner's position would have provided both regular pay and standing within the company's establishment, supporting the resources needed for a £50 0s 0d purchase. French's accumulation of property would have given him an established position on the island that could persist beyond his service in the garrison, providing for retirement or for transition into civilian planter status.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

He set out the background to the transaction. The Governor and Company of Merchants of London Trading to the East Indies had, by indenture dated 7 March 1694, leased ten acres of land in Sandy Bay to John Toster, soldier of the same island. The land was bounded on all sides, north, south, east and west, by the Right Honourable Company's waste land, as set out in the margin of the original lease, which was delivered and assigned over with the present document. Toster was to hold the premises, with his executors, administrators and assigns, for twenty-one years, on condition that he paid the company a yearly rent of forty shillings in four quarterly payments, together with the duties and customs that became due on the land, as set out in the original lease. The right, interest and estate of John Toster in the premises had since been transferred to Heath by lawful conveyance, and Heath now held them. By the present document, Heath, in consideration of the sum of £60 0s 0d in lawful money of the island paid to him by Paul Charles, free planter of the island, gave, granted, assigned and made over to Charles all his right, title, interest and unexpired term in the leased land and premises, together with the original lease. The Frenches' arrangement with Bagley of 1708 had given Bagley first refusal on the Frenches' property if they left the island. The Heath to French memorandum applies the same mechanism but in favour of the seller rather than the buyer, with Heath retaining a contingent right to reacquire the property if French ever left the island and chose to sell. The structure allowed Heath to preserve his connection to a property he had bought from Hemont and was now passing on to French, perhaps reflecting his sentimental or strategic interest in the parcel adjoining his own plantation. The dual dating clause of the Heath to French conveyance, recording the year as 1704 and 1705, follows the convention seen elsewhere of acknowledging both the old style year and the new style year for dates falling before 25 March. The execution on 13 March 1705 by modern reckoning fell within the period when the year could be written as 1704 by old style, since the new year did not begin until Lady Day. The recording of both forms in the dating clause shows the careful attention to calendar conventions that characterised the island's documentary practice. The Heath to Charles conveyance describes a different kind of property interest from the freehold transactions that dominate the records. The transaction transfers a leasehold interest, with Charles taking over the remainder of a twenty-one-year term that John Toster had originally received from the company in 1694. The structure shows that the company's leasehold system created tradeable interests that could be assigned between parties for cash consideration, with the remaining term carrying value that could be realised by the lessee through onward sale. The annual rent of forty shillings for ten acres of Sandy Bay land, paid in quarterly instalments to the company, establishes the rate at which the company's leasehold land was let to its tenants. The figure works out to about four shillings per acre per year. The fact that the company charged a rent at all, rather than simply granting the land in freehold, indicates that it preserved Sandy Bay land within a leasehold framework distinct from the freehold arrangements of valley and upland parcels. The reason for this distinction is not stated in the document, but it may reflect the company's desire to retain ultimate control over coastal land that was useful for its own purposes such as livestock grazing or strategic access to the shoreline. The price of £60 0s 0d that Charles paid Heath for the unexpired term of the leasehold gives a substantial valuation for what was now a leasehold interest with about eight years still to run, from 1705 to the expiry in 1715. The figure indicates that the leasehold interest carried considerable present value despite its term limitation, perhaps reflecting the productivity of the Sandy Bay land or the additional improvements that Heath or Toster had added during their occupation. The high price for a leasehold also suggests that the company's annual rent of forty shillings was significantly below the market value of the land, leaving substantial economic rent to the lessee that the leasehold interest captured. The chain of title for the Sandy Bay leasehold runs from the company's grant to John Toster on 7 March 1694, through an unspecified intermediate conveyance by which Heath acquired Toster's interest, to the present assignment to Paul Charles. The transactions show that the company's leasehold interests, like the freehold parcels, could move through multiple holders during the term of a single lease, with each transfer requiring formal documentation. The original lease document was physically delivered to the new holder as part of the assignment, providing him with the primary |

The original lease was the foundational instrument that established the company's grant and the lessee's obligations, and possession of that document was essential evidence of the title. The practice of physically transferring the original lease to each successive assignee ensured that the current holder always had the primary evidence of his interest, even as the assignment record-trail accumulated additional documents recording the successive transfers. The Sandy Bay location of the leasehold parcel, bounded entirely by the company's waste land, places it in the same configuration as the Cole holding at the head of Deep Valley, which was also surrounded entirely by company waste. The isolation of the parcel from neighbouring private holdings would have made it a discrete unit easily identifiable on the ground, with no boundary disputes possible because the surrounding land belonged solely to the company. The arrangement gave the lessee an enclosed working space within the broader company-held coastal lands. The phrase good and lawful assurance and conveyance in the law, used to describe the intermediate transaction by which Heath acquired Toster's interest, indicates that the original lease had been formally assigned to Heath by a recorded transaction equivalent to a freehold conveyance. The use of formal legal language to describe the earlier assignment shows that leasehold assignments operated under the same documentary standards as freehold conveyances, with each transfer creating a binding legal interest that could be passed on to subsequent assignees. Speculations The first refusal granted by John French to Edward Heath suggests that the parcel had a continuing significance to Heath that went beyond the price he had received for it. Heath's plantation lay next to the property, and his interest in preserving the option to reacquire it if French ever sold may have reflected concerns about future neighbours rather than simple sentiment. By securing first refusal, Heath ensured that he could choose to take the parcel back into his ownership rather than leaving the decision about its next holder to French alone. The arrangement reveals how landholders used documentary mechanisms to manage their long-term neighbourhood relationships, with first refusal clauses providing protection against unwelcome changes in the surrounding properties. The company's choice to lease Sandy Bay land for twenty-one-year terms at fixed rents, rather than granting it in freehold, perhaps reflects a deliberate strategy of preserving control over particular categories of land that the company expected to need for its own purposes at some future date. Sandy Bay's coastal position would have been valuable for landings, livestock grazing or other uses that the company might want to resume at the end of the lease terms. The leasehold structure allowed the company to extract income from the land during the interim while retaining the right to reclaim it at the end of the term, providing flexibility that the freehold grants did not allow. The substantial price of £60 0s 0d that Charles paid for the remaining eight years of the Sandy Bay leasehold indicates that the lease was a valuable property even with the limited term. The figure works out to roughly £7 10s 0d per remaining year of the leasehold, far above the forty-shilling annual rent paid to the company. The differential reflects the captured economic value of the lease, with the leasehold interest extracting most of the productive value of the land while the company |

The arrangement was profitable for the lessee but represented a significant under-collection of value by the company, which had let the land at rents that did not capture its full economic potential. The presence of Paul Charles as a new buyer in the records expands the population of identified property holders on the island during the early 1700s. Charles does not appear elsewhere in the materials reviewed under this name, suggesting that he was either a relatively recent arrival or a settler whose other transactions fell outside the period covered. His willingness to commit £60 0s 0d to a leasehold interest of limited term indicates that he had access to substantial resources and saw value in establishing a position in the Sandy Bay area. The transaction adds him to the growing roster of active participants in the island's property market by the middle of the first decade of the new century.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

The bounds were set out in the margin of the original lease, which was delivered with the present document. Toster was to hold the land for twenty-one years on the conditions stated in the lease. His right and interest had since been assigned to Edward Heath, free planter of the island. Heath had in turn assigned his right, interest and the ten years of the term still to run to Paul Charles, free planter of the island, for valuable consideration. Charles applied to the governor and council for a longer term and obtained an extension to ninety-nine years. The Governor and Company of Merchants Trading to the East Indies, by the present grant, granted and confirmed to Paul Charles the ten acres of land in Sandy Bay formerly demised to Toster, on the bounds set out in the original lease. Charles was to hold the premises, with his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for ninety-nine years from the expiration [...] Interpretations The grant of an extended ninety-nine-year term to Paul Charles, following his application to the governor and council, reveals a procedure by which leaseholders could approach the company for an extension of their term beyond the original twenty-one years. The arrangement effectively converted the residual ten-year leasehold that Charles had bought from Heath into a much longer-term interest, transforming the value of |

The extension required the agreement of both the local governor and council on the island and the underlying authority of the company in London, which the grant treated as a single act by combining the two levels of decision-making in a unified instrument. The ninety-nine-year term is the standard long lease in English property law, equivalent in commercial terms to a near-freehold interest because of its length relative to a normal human lifetime. The grant of such a term to Charles, on application, suggests that the company was prepared to convert its short-term leaseholds into effectively perpetual interests in exchange for the renewed engagement of the lessee. The procedure may have been designed to encourage long-term investment in the land by removing the uncertainty that came with shorter terms approaching expiry. The conversion would have justified greater investment in improvements such as buildings, hedges and water systems, which would have benefited both the lessee and the company at the end of the eventual term. The specific dating of the original Toster lease as 7 March 1694, written in the document as 1693/4 in the dual form, anchors the lease firmly within the calendar conventions of the period. The date fell just before Lady Day 1694, so by old style reckoning the year remained 1693 while the modern year was already 1694. The use of the dual form in this 1705 document, eleven years after the original lease, shows that the careful calendar conventions of the late seventeenth century were maintained in the records even when the dates being referenced no longer required such precision. The ten-year residual term carried in the 1705 assignment from Heath to Charles fixes the original twenty-one-year lease as expiring in 1715. The mathematical relationship between the 1694 lease date and the ten remaining years in 1705 confirms that the original term had been twenty-one years, with eleven years already elapsed by the time of the assignment. The new ninety-nine-year term, granted to commence from the expiration of the existing ten years, would therefore have run from 1715 until 1814, a near-century extension that effectively secured the property for Charles's lifetime and several generations beyond. The chain of title for the leasehold establishes a particular pattern of property movement. The company's original lease to a soldier, John Toster, in 1694, followed by transfer to a free planter, Edward Heath, and onward to another free planter, Paul Charles, traces the movement of company land from military to civilian hands through the assignment of leasehold interests. The pattern parallels the path seen in freehold transactions, where soldiers acquired land during their service and then sold or transferred it to civilian holders. The leasehold structure provided the same mechanism for movement between sectors of the island population while preserving the company's underlying interest in the land. The application by Charles to the governor and council for the extended term suggests an active process of engagement between the lessee and the company's local administration. Charles had to identify himself, explain his interest in the parcel and persuade the governor and council that the extension was warranted. The decision rested on the local administration's judgment about the merits of the application, with no apparent requirement for reference back to the company in London. The arrangement gave the local government substantial autonomy in administering the company's land, with the ability to commit the underlying freehold interest for periods far beyond the tenure of any individual official. The witness list for the Heath to Charles deed of 13 March 1705 includes Stephen Poirier, then governor, |

The presence of the governor as a personal witness to a leasehold assignment matches his earlier signature on the Swallow to Sech conveyance of 4 February 1705, indicating that Poirier was active in his official capacity at this time and willing to lend his witness to significant transactions. Des Fontaines's appearance as a witness, four years after his own acquisition of property, places him among the literate witnesses available for formal conveyancing on the island and confirms his continuing presence in the island's settler population. The indemnity clause in the Heath to Charles deed represents a more developed form of seller's warranty than the standard quiet enjoyment covenant. Heath undertook not only to allow Charles to hold the property without interference but to compensate Charles for any losses suffered through defects in Heath's title or interest in the leased premises. The clause shifted financial risk from the buyer to the seller's estate, with Charles entitled to claim against Heath for damages, costs and other consequences of any title problem that might emerge. The structure reflects the increasing sophistication of conveyancing practice on the island, with detailed allocation of risk between the parties through specific contractual provisions. Speculations The extension of Charles's leasehold from ten years to ninety-nine years on a single application points to a flexible administrative practice by which the governor and council could effectively convert short-term leases into long-term interests when it suited both the lessee and the company. The grant of such an extended term may have required the payment of an additional sum or the assumption of new obligations not recorded in the documents reviewed, although the brief description does not specify any such requirement. The conversion may also have aligned with broader company policy at the time, perhaps reflecting a shift toward longer-term leasing as a means of encouraging settlement and investment. The chain by which the Sandy Bay parcel moved from the soldier John Toster in 1694 to the free planter Edward Heath, and onward to the free planter Paul Charles, in 1705, traces a typical path of leasehold succession across about a decade. The pattern of military-to-civilian movement followed by an extension of the term suggests that the parcel had become productive enough during the original term to attract sustained civilian interest. Charles's willingness to pay £60 0s 0d for the residual ten years, and then to apply for a ninety-nine-year extension, indicates that he expected to derive substantial value from the parcel over the much longer horizon now available to him. The procedure for applying to the governor and council for a leasehold extension represents one of several ways in which the company's land administration interacted with private interests on the island. The exchange mechanism by which Hoskinson and Heath had earlier traded parcels with the company in 1704 was another such procedure, allowing planters to reshape their holdings through company-mediated transactions. The combination of exchanges and extensions gave the local administration significant flexibility in managing the company's land interests, while providing planters with mechanisms for adjusting their positions in ways that mere market transactions could not achieve. The presence of Stephen Poirier as governor in both the Swallow to Sech conveyance of February 1705 and the Heath to Charles assignment of March 1705 confirms his continuing tenure during the early months of that year. The pattern places Poirier in a notably hands-on role compared with the more distant oversight that might have characterised other periods of company administration.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

The Governor and Company set their common seal to one part of the document, and Paul Charles set his hand to the other part. The document was sealed on 13 March 1705. Sealed and delivered in the presence of Stephen Poirier and Thomas Goodwin. Elizabeth Rhodes to John Cotgrave. This indenture was made on 27 October 1687, in the third year of the reign of King James the Second of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, between Elizabeth Rhodes, wife and lawful attorney of William Rhodes, then absent from the island, of the one part, and John Cotgrave, planter of the same island, of the other part. Elizabeth Rhodes acted on behalf of her absent husband. In consideration of £10 0s 0d, of which £4 0s 0d had been paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the document, and the remaining £6 0s 0d to be paid in island provisions for the shipping, including bacon, fowls and other items, on 24 June 1688, she demised, granted and farm-let to John Cotgrave, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a parcel of land known as Rhodes plantation. The parcel contained about ten acres at the head of Sharks Valley. It bordered, on the east, land then held and occupied by Praise Pledger, planter; on the north, ten acres then held by John Stevens, planter; on the west, the Honourable Lords Proprietors' common or waste land; and on the south, twenty acres then held by John Knipe, planter. The parcel had been in William Rhodes's possession before his absence and was now in the possession of Elizabeth Rhodes as his wife and lawful attorney. The conveyance included all appurtenances, the timber and wood growing on the land, and all other associated conveniences. Cotgrave was to hold the ten acres, with all appurtenances, from the date of the document until the full end of a term of ninety-nine years. During the term, he was to pay William Rhodes, or Elizabeth Rhodes as his lawful attorney, a yearly rent [...] Interpretations The Elizabeth Rhodes to John Cotgrave indenture of 27 October 1687 is a leasehold transaction for ninety-nine years, with the seller acting under a power of attorney granted by her absent husband. The arrangement parallels the more recent Mary Carne and Margaret Cotgrave transactions in which wives acted as attorneys for absent husbands or for deceased relatives. The 1687 deed shows that the practice was already well established within the island's conveyancing system by the late seventeenth century, with the legal instrument of attorneyship enabling the orderly transfer of property even when the principal was unable to act in person. The price structure of £4 0s 0d in cash paid in hand and £6 0s 0d in island provisions due the following June reveals a sophisticated arrangement that combined immediate currency with deferred payment in agricultural commodities. The provisions specified |

The destination of these provisions was the shipping, meaning the East India Company ships that called at the island, suggesting that Rhodes either supplied provisions directly to the company stores or received them as a credit against future cash settlement. The arrangement converted the price partly into a commitment to supply provisions of a kind specifically required by the company's main customers, the ships passing through the island. The reference to the Honourable Lords Proprietors' common or waste land as the western boundary of the Rhodes plantation marks a distinctive form of address for the East India Company's underlying interest in the island. The phrase Lords Proprietors places the company in the position of feudal-style proprietors of the island, with their authority over the land deriving from their charter as the proprietors of the colony. The use of this language in 1687 reflects the language used in the company's early documents and parallels the language used for other proprietary colonies in the period, before the more bureaucratic phrasing of company common and company waste settled into standard use. The ninety-nine-year term of the Rhodes to Cotgrave lease, granted in 1687, anticipates by eighteen years the same length of term granted by the company to Paul Charles in 1705. The earlier date of the Rhodes lease establishes that ninety-nine-year terms were already in use on the island by 1687 for private leasehold transactions between settlers, well before the company itself began granting such extended terms on its own land. The pattern suggests that private practice may have led the way on long-term leasing, with the company's own administration adopting similar terms only later. The naming of the parcel as Rhodes plantation marks the assignment of a recognised name to a specific landholding, treating the property as a named estate rather than merely as a numbered or located parcel. The practice of naming plantations was widespread in other English colonies of the period, but its appearance here on St Helena indicates that the island's settler society had developed enough stability and identification with particular holdings to give them their own names. The Rhodes plantation continued to be identified by name in the title even as it changed hands, preserving the family identification with the parcel across the transfer. The chain of identified neighbours, with Praise Pledger to the east, John Stevens to the north and John Knipe to the south, provides another snapshot of the Sharks Valley settler population in 1687. Pledger appears as a free planter active in the area, with the unusual first name Praise marking him as probably a Puritan or Nonconformist settler from a tradition that favoured virtue names. John Stevens connects to the John Stevens whose ten acres in Sarahs Valley had been sold to Joseph Pratt and onward to James Casthope in the 1680s and 1690s, although whether the same man held land in both districts is not specified. John Knipe is a new figure not encountered elsewhere in the records reviewed. The transaction was structured as a leasehold rather than a freehold sale, despite the very long term of ninety-nine years. The choice perhaps reflected the absence of William Rhodes, with his wife as attorney not wishing to convey the freehold outright in case her husband returned and wanted to resume the property. The leasehold structure preserved the underlying freehold interest in the Rhodes family while granting Cotgrave essentially permanent use rights, achieving |

The continuing obligation gave the Rhodes family a perpetual stream of small payments during the term, providing a permanent income from the parcel even after the immediate cash and provisions price had been received. The arrangement combined the benefits of a sale, with substantial immediate payment, and the benefits of a tenancy, with continuing receipt of rents over a long period. The date of 27 October 1687 places the transaction within the third year of the reign of King James the Second, the same monarch whose regnal year is recorded in the Philip Savage to John Fuller conveyance of March 1686 and in the Joseph Pratt to James Casthope conveyance of July 1687. The three deeds together establish that the island's conveyancing practice consistently included the regnal year as part of the formal dating during this brief reign, in the same way that earlier and later deeds recorded the regnal years of William and Mary, Anne and other monarchs. Speculations The decision by Elizabeth Rhodes to lease the parcel for ninety-nine years rather than sell it outright perhaps reflected concern about the position she would be in if her husband returned. The terms of her power of attorney may have permitted leasing but not outright sale, requiring her to retain the underlying freehold interest in his name. The arrangement gave her the practical equivalent of a sale, with substantial immediate consideration plus continuing rents, while protecting her position against any later objection by her husband. The structure illustrates how attorneys managed the boundary between necessary action and the protection of the principal's interests. The form of the deferred payment in island provisions for the shipping, with bacon and fowls specifically named, suggests that Cotgrave was either a planter who would produce these commodities or had access to them through his commercial network. The destination of the provisions, the shipping calling at the island, indicates that the company maintained a regular demand for such supplies for its passing vessels. The transaction effectively channelled part of the price through the island's provisioning trade with the company, with Cotgrave delivering provisions in lieu of cash and Rhodes accepting them either for direct supply to the ships or for sale through other channels. The substantial size of the Rhodes plantation, with its named status and the long lease term of ninety-nine years, points to its importance within the Sharks Valley settler society of the 1680s. The eventual movement of the property into the Cotgrave household and then to Margaret Cotgrave as widow, traced across the records reviewed, shows how a single established holding could anchor a family's presence in the area over multiple decades. The Cotgrave acquisition through the leasehold mechanism gave them effective control over the parcel for the rest of the century and beyond, with the underlying Rhodes interest becoming a residual claim that survived only in name. The unusual practice of including timber and wood growing on the land within the conveyance, alongside the standard appurtenances, recalls the earlier and contemporary concern with timber as a separate property element on the island. The Jeffrey to Kersey memorandum of 1683 had penalised the seller for cutting wood after the sale. The Savage to Fuller deed of 1686 had named timber trees as part of the conveyance. The Rhodes to Cotgrave lease of 1687 took |

Elizabeth Rhodes, acting on behalf of her husband, bound him and his heirs to warrant the title against any claim by William Rhodes, his heirs and assigns, or by any other person claiming through them. She undertook to acquit, discharge and keep Cotgrave harmless, with the exception of duties on land or other assessments levied on the parcel, which were to be paid by Cotgrave and his successors. As attorney fully empowered to bind William Rhodes under the present document, she set her hand and seal to the document on the day and year written above. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Smoult, John Nicholls, John Stevens and Richard Keeling. Elizabeth Rhodes, with a seal attached.Island of St Helena. The particular copies and entries in the present register book were drawn from an older book that had become unbound and decayed by rats. The clerk of the council had now examined the entries in the presence of the witnesses named below. The witnesses subscribed their names at Fort James on 18 December 1707. Attested by John Alexander, clerk.Thomas Greene, Thomas Goodwin, Edward Washborne and William Marsden. Interpretations The reservation of a single peppercorn as the annual rent in the Rhodes to Cotgrave lease reveals the use of a nominal rent to preserve the legal form of a tenancy while extracting no real economic value from the lessee. The peppercorn rent was a standard English conveyancing device that allowed a long lease to take effect as a tenancy in law without imposing any genuine financial obligation on the lessee. The arrangement combined the legal advantages of a tenancy, with continuing recognition of the underlying freehold interest, with the commercial substance of an outright transfer for the duration of the term. The Rhodes family received their immediate payment in cash and provisions and then a token peppercorn annually for ninety-nine years, with the substantive ownership effectively passing to the Cotgrave household. The choice of St Michael's Day, 29 September, as the annual due date for the peppercorn rent corresponds with one of the four English quarter days. The quarter days, Lady Day on 25 March, Midsummer on 24 June, Michaelmas on 29 September and Christmas on 25 December, structured the annual cycle of rent payment, debt settlement, contract renewal and other periodic obligations. The use of Michaelmas as the rent day in the 1687 Rhodes lease shows that the English calendar of administrative periods had been transplanted to the island and was used to organise property transactions in the same way as in England itself. The phrase if the Same Shall be Lawfully and duly demanded, attached to the peppercorn rent obligation, reveals that the rent was payable only on demand rather than automatically. The Rhodes family or its successors would need to make a formal demand for the peppercorn each Michaelmas if they wished to enforce |

The conditional structure further reduced the practical significance of the rent obligation, since failure to demand the peppercorn for any year would extinguish that year's claim. The arrangement effectively meant that the rent existed primarily as a legal formality, with little expectation that it would actually be collected. The exception clause for duties on land and other assessments shifts the burden of any taxes or governmental charges to the lessee Cotgrave. The structure was standard in long leasehold arrangements, where the lessee took on the obligations associated with the working possession of the land while the underlying lessor retained only the residual interest. The clause indicates that the island administration imposed some form of land-based assessments by 1687, with property holders required to pay duties on their parcels. The nature and amount of these assessments are not specified in the document, but their existence reveals an early form of land taxation on the island. The attestation clause of 18 December 1707 records a major administrative event in the island's record-keeping. The original register book had become unbound and decayed by rats, requiring the entire body of entries to be copied into a new book. John Alexander, as clerk of the council, oversaw the copying and presented the new book for verification by senior witnesses. The fact that this verification took place at Fort James, with Thomas Goodwin among the attesting witnesses, places the event at the centre of the company's administration on the island. The damage to the original register by rats reveals a vulnerability of the island's documentary infrastructure to the local environment. Rats were a significant pest on St Helena throughout the period, having arrived with the ships and multiplied in the absence of natural predators. The destruction of paper records by such pests would have been a real and continuing problem, with the eventual decay of the original register requiring its replacement. The recopying of the entries into a new book preserved the legal record but introduced the possibility of copying errors that could affect the reliability of the recreated text. The attestation of the new register by John Alexander as clerk, alongside Thomas Greene, Thomas Goodwin, Edward Washborne and William Marsden, provides a careful evidentiary foundation for the recopied entries. The combination of the clerk who had carried out the work with four senior witnesses gave the new book the weight needed to substitute for the original. The witnesses included Thomas Goodwin, who by 18 December 1707 had been governor of the island, and the other named witnesses included substantial figures from the island's administrative establishment. The recopying of the register in late 1707 also explains certain features of the documents reviewed across the materials. The frequent appearance of John Alexander as clerk certifying earlier deeds reflects his role in copying those deeds from the original register into the new book. The Vera Copia notations attached to many of the documents, indicating that they were true copies certified by Alexander, represent his work in the recopying process. The new register therefore presents the deeds at one remove from their original form, with the integrity of the entries depending on the accuracy of the copying work undertaken in 1707. The date of 18 December 1707 places the attestation just three days after the Goodwin to Hoskinson memorandum of 16 December 1707. The temporal proximity suggests that Goodwin in his capacity as governor was actively present at Fort James during this period, attending to both his official duties in attesting the register and his private transactions in |

The pattern reveals how the highest administrative responsibility on the island intersected directly with the personal property interests of the man holding the office. Speculations The use of a peppercorn rent in the 1687 Rhodes to Cotgrave lease was perhaps designed to address the specific situation of an absent husband whose return could not be predicted. By preserving a nominal continuing relationship between the Rhodes family and the parcel, the arrangement maintained the freehold interest in William Rhodes's name while granting practical control to Cotgrave for the very long term of ninety-nine years. If William Rhodes had returned during that period, his theoretical position as freeholder would have been preserved, although the practical consequences for Cotgrave's leasehold would have been minimal given the length of the term. The structure provided maximum flexibility for the future while securing the immediate exchange of consideration. The reconstruction of the register in 1707, after rats had destroyed the original book, perhaps reflects a wider concern with the security of the island's documentary records during this period. The careful recopying and attestation of the new book at Fort James, with the governor himself among the witnesses, indicates that the company's administration recognised the central importance of preserving the property record. The new book would have been intended to last for longer than its predecessor, perhaps with better binding and storage to resist rat damage, although the underlying vulnerability of paper records to the island's pests would have continued to pose a risk. The decision to recopy the entire register at one time, rather than progressively updating the older book or maintaining two parallel records, suggests that the original book had reached a point where individual entries could no longer be reliably read or extracted. The decayed state of the binding and the rat damage may have rendered the original entries fragmentary, requiring a comprehensive transcription effort to preserve the surviving information. The result was a new book containing the recovered entries of the older book together with entries made directly into the new volume from the date of its commencement. The names of the witnesses to the December 1707 attestation include figures who appear repeatedly throughout the records. Thomas Goodwin in his various capacities, William Marsden as a witness to other transactions of 1707, and John Alexander in his clerk's role all confirm the small group of administrative and senior settler figures who provided continuity in the island's record-keeping. The combination of these figures in the attestation event places them at the centre of a coordinated effort to preserve the legal foundations of property holding on the island. |

He acknowledged that he had received from John Goodwin, planter of the same island, the sum of £20 0s 0d in current money of the island, paid in hand. He gave, granted, bargained and sold to John Goodwin, his heirs, executors and assigns, ten acres of land with all the plantation and provisions standing on it. Goodwin made the conveyance by virtue of a power given to him in a letter of attorney from Prudence Sherwin, the wife and attorney of the absent Thomas Sherwin. The parcel bordered, on the east, ten acres then held by John Goodwin himself, originally the lot of Thomas Davis. It bordered Pator Williams's land on the west, Richard Harding's land on the north, and the Right Honourable Company's waste land on the south. John Goodwin was to hold the premises, with his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for ever, subject to the conditions contained in the original grant of the premises from the Governor and Company of Merchants of London Trading to the East Indies to Edward Suffolk. He acknowledged full payment and complete satisfaction. He gave, granted, bargained, sold and delivered to Powell, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a dwelling house and fifty acres of land, with all appurtenances of every kind. The property lay in some branches of Chapel Valley. Powell was to hold the house and the fifty acres [...] Interpretations The Thomas Goodwin to John Goodwin conveyance of 1 September 1694 reveals a further chain of attorneyship in the island's property dealings, with Thomas Goodwin acting as attorney for Prudence Sherwin, who was herself the attorney for her absent husband Thomas Sherwin. The double-layered attorney arrangement, in which a wife exercised authority over absent husband's property and then delegated that authority to a third party for specific transactions, shows the sophistication of the legal infrastructure available to settlers managing distant or absent interests. Prudence Sherwin's letter of attorney to Thomas Goodwin had been formally proved at a council meeting on 25 October 1694, almost two months after the conveyance itself was executed on 1 September 1694, suggesting that the proving of the instrument was a separate confirmatory step rather than a precondition to its use. The dating discrepancy raises questions about the recorded chronology of the conveyance. The deed itself bears the date 1 September 1694, but the underlying letter of attorney was apparently dated 8 July 1694, with the proving recorded on 25 October 1694. The proving date falls almost two months after the conveyance execution date, which presents a logical inconsistency if the proving was understood as authenticating the attorney's authority before action could be taken on it. The discrepancy may reflect either an error in the recorded dates during the 1707 recopying of the register, or a procedure in which the underlying attorneyship was retrospectively confirmed by council after the action taken under it. The price of £20 0s 0d for ten acres at the Sherwin location gives a per-acre figure of £2 0s 0d, falling within the higher range of values seen in the records reviewed. The figure stands close to the £2 8s 0d per acre that Goodwin obtained from Hoskinson for the French parcel in December 1707 and the £1 13s 4d per acre from the Leach to Carne transaction of 1705. The Sherwin parcel had originally been the lot of Edward |

|                    |                 |                   | Suffolk, who appears for the first time in the records reviewed as one of the original allottees of the area. The recording of the original conveyance from the Governor and Company to Edward Suffolk as the underlying grant, with the present conveyance taking effect under the conditions contained in that grant, illustrates the persistence of the original allotment conditions through subsequent transfers. The conditions of the Bevan grant of 1684, requiring true faith and allegiance to the king and the company and obedience to the laws of the island, would have applied to the Sherwin parcel as well, with each successive holder taking the land subject to the original obligations. The structure ensured that the conditions of the company's authority over the land continued indefinitely, regardless of how many private transfers had taken place. The witnesses to the Thomas Goodwin to John Goodwin conveyance include James Duffe, who had served as a witness to the Coles to Goodwin conveyance of 1696, George Hoskinson, who had been on the island as a property dealer throughout this period, Matthew Bazett, and F. Gargen, who had also witnessed the Greentree to Johnson conveyance of 1698. The recurring presence of these witnesses across the records confirms again that the formal property dealings on the island depended on a small circle of literate men who served as witnesses to one another's transactions. The interlineation correction recorded at the foot of the document, with George Hoskinson and Thomas Goodwin both signing to confirm the location and substance of the change, follows the same pattern of carefully documented alterations seen in the Casthope to Wells and Swallow to Sech deeds. The practice of recording interlineations indicates the importance of maintaining the integrity of the documentary record against later challenge, with every alteration to the original text noted and confirmed by the parties at the time of execution. The Hoskinson to Powell conveyance shows George Hoskinson again as a major property dealer, with the sale of a dwelling house and fifty acres in Chapel Valley for the substantial sum of £350 0s 0d. The price represents one of the largest transactions in the records reviewed, exceeded only by Goodwin's £130 0s 0d Chapel Valley tenement purchase from Edmunds and the £500 0s 0d Gurling to Hoskinson sale of 1706. The figure indicates that Hoskinson had assembled a major estate by the time of this sale, with the Chapel Valley property representing a substantial portion of his accumulated holdings. The reference to some branches of Chapel Valley, used to identify the location of the Hoskinson property, suggests that the broader Chapel Valley district extended into several subsidiary valleys or gullies that branched off the main valley. The phrase points to a more complex topography than the single Chapel Valley name might suggest, with the working land of the district scattered through multiple smaller valleys rather than concentrated in one place. The wording also indicates that the property in question lay across multiple branches rather than in a single location, perhaps reflecting the assembled nature of the holding. Speculations The chain of attorneyship by which Thomas Goodwin executed the 1694 conveyance reveals a particular feature of the island's property administration. The willingness of the island's legal practice to allow attorneys to delegate to further attorneys, with two layers of representation between the principal Thomas Sherwin and the actual conveyance to John Goodwin, points to a flexible understanding of agency that adapted to the practical realities of long-distance |

Prudence Sherwin had perhaps found it convenient to delegate to Thomas Goodwin for specific transactions rather than attending to every detail herself, with her own authority as attorney providing the basis for further sub-delegations. The decision to involve Thomas Goodwin as the immediate attorney for the Sherwin transaction connects to his broader role within the island's property circles by 1694. Goodwin had been on the island as a witness from 1683, had acquired his first private property in 1693, and was building up his administrative position in the company's establishment. His participation as attorney for the Sherwin sale, alongside his own purchases and his role as witness to other transactions, reveals the multifaceted character of his early property activity. The position of attorney would have given him visibility into transactions in which he had no direct interest, providing knowledge and connections that supported his broader accumulation strategy. The very large transaction between Hoskinson and Powell for £350 0s 0d hints at substantial concentration of property in certain hands by the time of this transaction. Powell had appeared earlier as the buyer of the Hoskinson Peak Gult parcel in 1704 for £32 0s 0d and as the seller to Gurling on the same day for £100 0s 0d. The much larger £350 0s 0d transaction places Powell in the position of a major buyer rather than a same-day intermediary, suggesting that his role had evolved over the intervening years from a participant in chain transactions to a substantial accumulator in his own right. The Chapel Valley property would have given him a significant estate in the principal settled area of the island. The Edward Suffolk identified as the original allottee of the Sherwin parcel appears for the first time in the records reviewed. The Suffolk name does not feature in the 1682 inquest, which suggests either that he received his allotment after that date or that the inquest record reviewed does not capture every original holder. The persistence of Suffolk's name as the identification of the parcel through subsequent transfers to Sherwin and onward to Goodwin shows the durable character of original allotment names within the island's record-keeping, with the original holder's name serving as a permanent marker of the parcel's identity. |

The transaction was witnessed by George Carne and John Alexander, placing it within the same circle of substantial property dealings recorded across the materials. The £350 0s 0d price falls within five weeks of the £500 0s 0d Gurling to Hoskinson transaction of 12 October 1706, which suggests that Hoskinson was both buying and selling on a substantial scale during this period. The combination of the September 1706 sale to Powell and the October 1706 purchase from Gurling indicates that Hoskinson was reorganising his property holdings rather than simply accumulating or divesting in one direction. The Powell sale released £350 0s 0d in cash from the Chapel Valley fifty acres, while the Gurling purchase committed £500 0s 0d in bills of exchange for the Little Horse Pasture and Lemon Valley assets plus livestock and provisions. The net effect was a shift of capital from Chapel Valley into other districts and into the more diverse asset base that the Gurling estate provided. The pattern suggests deliberate portfolio management rather than passive participation in the island's land market. The Walter Morris to John Clavering conveyance, of unspecified date, transfers a Chapel Valley dwelling house from Morris to a gunner's mate of the garrison. The property had formerly belonged to Morris's late father, identifying it as inherited property now being sold by the son. The transaction follows the pattern seen elsewhere in the records where second-generation settlers disposed of inherited property to members of the garrison, with the soldier or junior officer using accumulated pay to acquire established holdings from the heirs of original allottees. The description of John Clavering as gunner's mate places him in the same position that Thomas Goodwin had held in 1694 before his rise to senior administrative office. The gunner's mate was the assistant to the chief gunner, helping to manage the artillery and powder stores at Fort James, and the position offered a measure of standing within the garrison hierarchy along with sufficient pay to support modest property purchases. Clavering's £40 0s 0d acquisition fits the pattern of garrison members of intermediate rank participating in the island's urban property market. The phrase paid or secured to be paid, used in the Morris to Clavering deed in the same form as in the 1691 Kersey to Goodwin conveyance, indicates that part or all of the £40 0s 0d purchase price might be deferred under a separate security arrangement rather than delivered as immediate cash. The flexibility provided in the wording allowed Clavering to spread the payment across some period after the conveyance, with Morris accepting the credit risk in exchange for the agreed total value. The arrangement reveals the continuing role of deferred payment arrangements in the island's property market by the time of this transaction. The Morris property description identifies the dwelling house as standing in Chapel Valley with all the ground on the back side of the house. The reference to all the ground that Morris could claim any right or title to suggests some uncertainty about the precise extent of his interest in the ground behind the house. The clause may reflect either a desire to convey only what he was |

The phrasing differs from the more confident assertions of title seen in other deeds and points to a more cautious approach where the seller's interest was not fully settled. Speculations The £350 0s 0d that Powell paid Hoskinson for the Chapel Valley fifty acres and dwelling house represents a substantial commitment that fits Powell's emergence as a major property holder. By September 1706 he was capable of paying a sum of this size, which when combined with his earlier role in same-day intermediate transactions suggests an evolution from a smaller-scale dealer to a settled accumulator. The acquisition of fifty acres with a house in Chapel Valley would have given him a substantial estate in the most important settled district of the island, anchoring his position within the local property-owning class. Walter Morris's sale of his inherited father's house to Clavering may reflect either a decision to consolidate his interests elsewhere on the island or a need to convert the inheritance into cash. The phrasing about the ground on the back side, with its qualification about what he could claim title to, suggests that Morris may have inherited the property in a state where some questions about its precise boundaries remained unresolved. The sale to Clavering would have transferred those uncertainties to the buyer along with the more straightforward title to the house itself, with Clavering taking on whatever investigation might be needed to establish the full extent of the ground. The recurring participation of John Alexander as a witness to substantial transactions including the Hoskinson to Powell sale, alongside his work in copying the entire register in late 1707, places him at the centre of the island's documentary infrastructure during this period. His professional role as clerk of the council combined with his personal availability as a witness to specific deeds made him the most ubiquitous figure in the recorded property dealings of the early 1700s. The combination of these two activities gave him an intimate knowledge of the island's land transactions that few others on the island could match. |

He gave, granted and confirmed to his son in law Praise Pledger, planter of the island, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, ten acres of land at the head of Sharks Valley. The grant was made for the natural affection and love that Seale bore to Pledger. The parcel bordered the Right Honourable Company's waste land, the ten acres then held by John Cotgrave, planter, and the twenty acres then held by John Knipe, planter. The ten acres were then in Pledger's possession and had formerly been the lot of William Rhodes, since died. Pledger was to hold the land, with all provisions standing on it and all appurtenances, from the date of the document for ever, with no money or other consideration to be paid to Seale or his successors. He set his hand and seal to the document on 16 January 1693. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of [...] Benjamin Seale, with a seal attached. Interpretations The Seale to Pledger deed of 16 January 1693 records a family gift rather than a sale, with Benjamin Seale conveying ten acres to his son in law Praise Pledger for natural affection and love rather than for monetary consideration. The instrument follows the same structural pattern as the Owen Bevan to Thomas Goodwin gift of 1705, in which a father in law transferred property to a son in law on the basis of family relationship. The Seale deed comes earlier in the period covered by the records and shows that family gifts of land had been operating within the island's conveyancing system from at least the early 1690s, providing a recognised mechanism alongside commercial sales for moving property between generations. The chain of title for the parcel runs from William Rhodes, since died, to Benjamin Seale, and now from Seale to Pledger. The parcel had formerly been Rhodes's lot land, and it appears to have come into Seale's possession at some point after Rhodes's death. The connection to the Rhodes family suggests that there may have been an earlier transaction not captured in the records reviewed, perhaps a transfer between Rhodes's estate and Seale. The naming of the parcel as formerly Rhodes's lot preserves the original allotment identity through both transfers, with the underlying connection to the Rhodes household persisting even as the land moved through other hands. The reference to William Rhodes as deceased in this 1693 deed indicates that Rhodes had died by that date, which clarifies the position seen in the earlier 1687 lease from Elizabeth Rhodes as his attorney to John Cotgrave. In 1687 Rhodes was described as absent from the island, with his wife acting under a power of attorney. By 1693 he was deceased, so his death must have occurred at some point during the intervening six years. The Cotgrave lease for ninety-nine years remained in effect after his death, with the underlying freehold passing to whoever inherited from him. The boundary description of the Pledger parcel identifies three neighbouring holders, all encountered earlier in the records. John Cotgrave held the ten acres adjoining on one side, which connects to the leasehold he had taken from Elizabeth Rhodes in 1687. John Knipe held twenty acres on another side, the same Knipe mentioned in the Rhodes to Cotgrave lease as the southern neighbour. The pattern shows that the property network at the head of Sharks Valley remained stable across the six years between the two transactions, with the same families holding the same parcels in 1693 as in 1687. The phrase without any Money or other thing to be yielded paid or done makes explicit that the conveyance was a pure gift, with no consideration moving from Pledger to Seale. The clause prevented any later claim by Seale's heirs that the conveyance had been intended as a sale with deferred payment, securing Pledger's title against any reinterpretation of the transaction. The careful drafting reveals the importance attached to the gratuitous nature of the gift in protecting the recipient against future challenges. The presence of Praise Pledger as the son in law of Benjamin Seale points to a marriage between Seale's daughter and Pledger, with the gift to Pledger effectively serving as a marriage portion or family settlement. The Pledger name appears as Praise Pledger in this deed and as Praise Pledger again in the 1687 Rhodes to Cotgrave |

The continuity of his name across the two records, with his Puritan-style first name preserved in both, confirms his identity as a substantial settler at the head of Sharks Valley by the late seventeenth century. The dating of 16 January 1693 falls before 25 March in the old calendar, so by modern reckoning the date would be 16 January 1694. The recorded year of 1693 reflects the old style usage where the new year began on Lady Day. The single year in the dating, without the dual form used in the Casthope to Wells and Heath to Charles deeds, suggests that the scribe in this 1693 transaction used the older convention without the bridging device of dual dating that appeared more frequently in later years. The witness names that appear in the deed body are not recorded in the text reviewed, which suggests that the witness signatures were carried over to a subsequent page that does not form part of the immediate transcription. The omission limits the certainty about who witnessed this family gift, although the recurring pattern in the records would predict the involvement of figures such as John Alexander or other senior scribes in the formal authentication of the document. Speculations The gift from Benjamin Seale to Praise Pledger illustrates the role of marriage settlements in moving property within the island's settler society. Pledger's marriage to one of Seale's daughters brought the ten-acre parcel into the new household, providing the couple with a foundation for their independent life. The mechanism parallels the William Marsh provision of substitute land to his son Robert Marsh in 1705 and the Owen Bevan transfer to his son in law Thomas Goodwin in 1705, all of which involved fathers or fathers in law providing land to younger family members at significant moments in their lives. The pattern shows that family gifts were a standard feature of the island's property economy, sitting alongside commercial transactions in the formal record. The location of the gifted parcel at the head of Sharks Valley, adjoining Pledger's existing holding to the east as recorded in the 1687 Rhodes to Cotgrave lease, suggests that the gift was designed to consolidate Pledger's working estate. He already had property in the immediate vicinity, and the addition of the ten acres from his father in law gave him a larger continuous block of land. The arrangement matches the broader pattern of estate consolidation seen throughout the records, with successive transactions producing increasingly coherent working units from the dispersed original allotments. The use of family gifts as a mechanism for moving property to the next generation may have offered advantages over outright sale that account for its repeated appearance in the records. The gift form preserved the giver's continuing connection to the property as the original source of the recipient's title, while the sale form transferred the parcel as an arm's length transaction. The family gift also avoided the need for the recipient to find the purchase price in cash or other consideration, providing a smoother route for transferring property within families. The continuing affection language of the gift deeds preserved the sentimental dimension of the family relationship even as the transaction served practical economic purposes. The persistence of the William Rhodes identification of the parcel, even after it had moved through Benjamin Seale's hands and now to Praise Pledger, fits the broader pattern of original allotment names surviving multiple transfers. The dispersion of the Rhodes holdings after William's death reflects the typical pattern by which the estates of deceased holders were distributed among the surviving settler population through various legal mechanisms.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

The price was £10 0s 0d, paid in hand. Grandy promised to deliver quiet possession without molestation and to hand over all writings and deeds of gifts relating to the property. He set his hand to the document on 2 August 1705. Witnesses: Richard Harding and James Casteyp, who made his mark in the form of an X. James Grandy made his mark in the form of a Y. Memorandum. The cottage house, together with all the ground in front of and behind it, was since sold to Hugh Bodley, free planter, who now held it in his possession. Island of St Helena. Thomas Ashby to Hugh Bodley. Thomas Ashby, soldier, made known by these presents that he had received from Hugh Bodley, soldier of the same island, the sum of £15 0s 0d in store credit. He acknowledged full payment and complete satisfaction. He gave, granted, bargained, sold and delivered to Bodley, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, a messuage house in Chapel Valley. The property joined the house then in the possession of George Hoskinson and had formerly belonged to John Bowman, free planter, since died. Bodley was to hold the house, with all appurtenances, to himself and his heirs for ever, to dispose of at his own will and pleasure. Ashby bound himself and his successors to allow Bodley to hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the house without any hindrance from him or from anyone acting through him. He set his hand and seal to the document on 28 May 1703. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of John Clavering, Peres Sortelben and John Alexander. Thomas Ashby made his mark in the form of a T, with a seal attached. Interpretations The two transactions involving the Chapel Valley cottage house reveal an irregularity in the chronology of the documentary record as transcribed. The Grandy to Ashby sale is dated 2 August 1705, while the Ashby to Bodley sale is dated 28 May 1703, more than two years earlier. The Ashby to Bodley deed cannot have been executed before the Grandy to Ashby sale unless the dates have been transcribed incorrectly, since Ashby could not have sold a house in 1703 that he did not acquire until 1705. The arrangement of the documents may reflect a copying error during the 1707 recopying of the register, with one of the dates being misread from the damaged original. The internal logic suggests that the Grandy to Ashby sale should be dated 1701 or 1702 rather than 1705, allowing the subsequent Ashby to Bodley sale of 1703 to follow naturally. The chain of ownership extending across the two transactions traces a single Chapel Valley cottage through three holders. The property had originally been held by John Bowman, free planter, who died and presumably passed it to his estate. Bowman's name is preserved in the description of the parcel even after his death, with the Ashby to Bodley deed identifying the house as formerly belonging to him. The continuity of identification points again to the persistence of original holder names in the island's property records, with each |

Hoskinson appears throughout the records as a major property dealer, and his ownership of a Chapel Valley house adjacent to this smaller cottage fits the pattern of substantial accumulations in the principal urban district. The repeated identification of his property as a boundary marker shows that Hoskinson was sufficiently established in Chapel Valley by 1703 and 1705 to serve as a recognised reference point for neighbouring transactions. The structure of the consideration in the two transactions differs significantly. The Grandy to Ashby sale was for £10 0s 0d paid in hand, presumably in cash. The Ashby to Bodley sale was for £15 0s 0d paid in store credit, the same form of payment seen in the Greentree to Johnson conveyance of 1698. The use of store credit rather than cash for the second sale reflects the continuing role of company stores as a clearing system within the island's economy. Ashby would have used the credit to purchase goods at the company stores, with the credit balance moving from Bodley to Ashby's account through the company's bookkeeping. The £5 0s 0d markup between the two transactions, with the price rising from £10 0s 0d in the Grandy purchase to £15 0s 0d in the Ashby resale, indicates either substantial improvement of the property during Ashby's ownership or a general appreciation of Chapel Valley property values during this period. The difference is large in proportional terms, with the price increasing by half over what could have been a relatively short holding period. The figures suggest that the small Chapel Valley cottage market was active enough to absorb modest mark-ups between successive transactions. The transaction between Ashby and Bodley took place between two members of the garrison, both designated as soldier in the deed. The acquisition of urban property by junior military personnel matches the pattern seen elsewhere in the records, with garrison members of various ranks participating in the island's property market alongside the civilian planters. The use of store credit for the consideration would have been particularly convenient for soldiers, whose pay was typically held in store credit at the company before being drawn down for purchases. The presence of John Alexander as a witness to the Ashby to Bodley deed reflects his ubiquitous role across the records. The witness list also includes John Clavering, who appears elsewhere as a gunner's mate buying the Morris property in 1707, and Peres Sortelben, a name that does not appear elsewhere in the materials reviewed and may indicate another settler of continental European origin given the unusual spelling. The combination of these witnesses places the transaction within the standard network of literate participants in the island's formal conveyancing practice. The memorandum about the onward sale to Hugh Bodley, attached to the Grandy to Ashby record, provides a useful cross-reference between the two transactions. The memorandum indicates that the recorder of the register was aware of the subsequent disposal of the property and considered it appropriate to note the connection. The practice of attaching such cross-references shows how the register served not only as a record of individual transactions but as a working tool for tracking the current state of property holdings on the island. Speculations The probable dating error in one of the two transactions perhaps reflects the challenges of recopying |

The clerk John Alexander would have had to work from possibly fragmentary text, and dates were among the elements most likely to be misread or transcribed incorrectly. The internal contradiction between the apparent dates of the two transactions points to a genuine chronological problem in the records as preserved, which the modern reader can identify but the original parties would not have intended. The repeated use of store credit as consideration for property transactions, seen in both the Greentree to Johnson conveyance of 1698 and the Ashby to Bodley sale of 1703, indicates that the company stores functioned as a significant clearing mechanism within the island's economy. Settlers held credit balances at the stores that they could draw on for purchases, and these balances could be transferred between parties as the equivalent of cash. The system supported transactions in which the parties either did not have cash available or preferred to denominate the price in a form that corresponded to their expected spending patterns. The progression of the Chapel Valley cottage through Bowman, Grandy, Ashby and Bodley illustrates the active circulation of small urban properties within the island's settler population. Each transaction transferred the property to a new owner with different circumstances and resources, with the recurring sales producing a continual reshuffling of ownership within the Chapel Valley settlement. The pattern matches the broader picture of property circulation on the island, with parcels of all sizes and types moving through multiple hands during the period covered by the records. The presence of soldiers as both seller and buyer in the Ashby to Bodley transaction shows that the garrison hosted an internal market for property among its members, with soldiers selling to and buying from one another. Ashby's role as both buyer in the 1705 acquisition from Grandy and seller in the apparent 1703 transfer to Bodley, despite the chronological problem in the dates, places him as an active dealer in Chapel Valley property regardless of the precise sequence. The pattern of internal garrison transactions reveals a self-contained market that operated alongside the larger civilian property market on the island. |

He acknowledged full payment and released Allis from any further claim in respect of the sum. For this consideration and for other good causes, he granted, bargained and sold to Allis, planter of the same island, a stone house in Chapel Valley near Fort James, with all appurtenances. Allis was to hold the house, with all appurtenances, to himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns from the date of the document for ever. Tomps bound himself and his successors to allow Allis to hold, occupy and enjoy the house without any lawful hindrance, suit, trouble, eviction, contradiction or disturbance from him or from anyone acting through him. He set his hand and seal to the document on 25 January 1688. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Richard Gurling and William Cliston. Robert Tomps, with a seal attached. Island of St Helena. John Hemmons to Thomas Allis. Articles of agreement were concluded between John Hemmons, soldier of the island, of the one part, and Thomas Allis of the same island, of the other part. The second and final instalment of £5 6s 0d was to be paid three months after the first, in the same form. For this consideration, Hemmons gave, granted, bargained and sold to Allis, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, ten acres of land in Deep Valley, adjoining or near the land formerly held by Benjamin Meller. Hemmons had exchanged the parcel with the governor and council of the island, acting for the Right Honourable East India Company as lords proprietors of the island. He had given up ten acres at the head of Deep Valley, adjoining the land [...] Interpretations The Tomps to Allis conveyance of 25 January 1688 represents one of the earlier transactions in the records reviewed. The date falls before 25 March in the old calendar, so by modern reckoning the year would be 1689 rather than 1688. The deed is written with the year as 1687/8 in the original convention, recorded here in the dual form to acknowledge both reckonings. The transaction predates the joint reign of William and Mary, falling within the brief reign of James the Second, although the dating clause as transcribed does not include the regnal year that other deeds of the period typically carried. The property conveyed is described as a stone house in Chapel Valley near Fort James, marking it as a more substantial structure than the dwellings of timber and other materials that may have characterised most of the island's buildings. The use of stone as a construction material would have required considerable investment of resources and labour, since suitable building stone needed to be quarried, dressed and transported to the building site. The naming of the construction material in the deed signals the importance and durability of the structure, with the stone house carrying value that a perishable timber building would not have offered. The price of £8 10s 0d for the stone house places it at a relatively modest valuation compared with other Chapel Valley properties. The figure falls below the £10 0s 0d that Grandy received for the cottage house in 1705, the £20 0s 0d that Nicholls paid Bowman for a Fort James Valley dwelling and the £35 12s 0d that Cotgrave paid Tewdsdale for a Chapel Valley dwelling house in 1694. The lower price for a stone house compared to other Chapel Valley dwellings suggests either that the property was smaller, or that its position was less favourable, or that the date in 1688 reflects an earlier point in the appreciation of Chapel Valley property values. The proximity to Fort James suggests an urban location that should have commanded a reasonable price, so the relatively modest sum may indicate the early date of the transaction rather than any limitation in the property itself. The Hemmons to Allis articles of agreement record an exchange chain involving both the company and a private party. Hemmons had first exchanged ten acres at the head of Deep Valley with the company, receiving ten acres in Deep Valley adjoining or near the land formerly held by Benjamin Meller in return. He was now selling these acquired ten acres to Allis for £10 6s 0d in two instalments. The transaction reveals the layered character of property dealings on the island, with a single piece of land moving through both an exchange with the company and a subsequent private sale within a short period. The structure of the consideration in the Hemmons to Allis agreement, with two instalments of £5 0s 0d and £5 6s 0d three months apart, in current money of the island or store credit, illustrates the flexibility of payment arrangements in the island's property market. The buyer could choose between cash and store credit for each instalment, depending on what |

The arrangement allowed Allis to manage his payments according to his actual circumstances rather than committing to a single form of consideration at the outset. The reference to the next pay day as the trigger for the first instalment ties the transaction to the company's regular cycle of payments to its employees and contractors. Pay days were predictable events in the island's economic life, providing settlers with regular access to cash or store credit through which obligations could be settled. The use of the pay day as a reference point indicates that both Hemmons and Allis expected to receive resources through the company's pay system, which they could then apply to the property transaction. The exchange mechanism by which Hemmons swapped his original Deep Valley land with the company for different Deep Valley land mirrors the procedure recorded in the 1704 Hoskinson and Heath exchanges in Peak Gult. The pattern suggests that the company's exchange procedure was a standard feature of the island's land administration, allowing planters to reshape their holdings by trading parcels with the company. The exchanges enabled holders to obtain more suitable land in particular locations while the company received parcels that could be redistributed or retained according to its own purposes. The naming of John Hemmons as a soldier in the Hemmons to Allis agreement distinguishes him from the John Hemmons of the 1682 inquest, who was identified as the holder of land in Pleasant Valley exchanged with Henry Coales. The two men may be the same person, with the 1682 figure having become a soldier by the time of the later agreement, or they may be different individuals with the same name. The continuity of the name across the records suggests a family connection at least, with the Hemmons surname appearing repeatedly in transactions throughout the period. Speculations The relatively early date of 1688 for the Tomps to Allis stone house transaction places it among the foundational records of the property registration system on the island. The deed represents one of the earliest dated transactions in the materials reviewed and predates by several years the better-documented transactions of the 1690s and 1700s. The presence of the stone house at this date indicates that substantial permanent construction had begun in Chapel Valley by the late 1680s, with planters investing in durable structures suitable for long-term occupation. The two-instalment payment structure of the Hemmons to Allis agreement, with three months between the first and second payments, perhaps reflects the seller's need for immediate funds combined with the buyer's inability to assemble the full price at once. The arrangement gave Hemmons half the price quickly while allowing Allis time to gather the balance, with the company's pay day cycle providing the predictable rhythm against which both parties could plan. The flexibility of the payment form, with cash and store credit interchangeable, reduced the practical obstacles to completion. The reference to the East India Company as lords proprietors of the island, used in the description of the company's role in the exchange, reflects the formal language of the company's authority over St Helena. The phrase places the company in the position of feudal-style proprietors holding the island under royal charter, with their authority over the land deriving from this proprietary status. The use of this language alongside more bureaucratic phrasing throughout the records shows the layered character of the company's |

Allis would have been positioning himself with both a substantial urban dwelling in Chapel Valley and an agricultural holding in Deep Valley, the typical combination for an established planter on the island. The Allis name connects to the Thomas Allis who appears in the 1682 inquest as a holder of ten acres in Fishers Valley adjoining Benjamin Miller's land, with these later transactions adding to his accumulated holdings over the years following the inquest.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

Allis was to hold the parcel and all appurtenances, including wood, trees, sprights and other growing material on the land, to his use and benefit for ever, freely and quietly, without any challenge, claim, demand or hindrance from Hemmons or his successors. Hemmons bound himself to make good the title to Allis and his successors whenever the buyer might be challenged by any person. He set his hand and seal to the document on 4 May 1696, in the eighth year of the reign of King William, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of F. Field, Thomas Usher and Matthew Bazett.John Hemmons, with a seal attached.John Stevens to Thomas Allis. This indenture was made on 5 August 1689 between John Stevens, planter of the island of St Helena, of the one part, and Thomas Allis, planter of the same island, of the other part. Stevens acknowledged that he was to receive from Allis the sum of £12 0s 0d, secured to be paid. For this consideration and for other good causes, he demised, granted and farm-let to Allis, his heirs, executors or assigns, a parcel of land of about ten acres at the head of Deep Valley. The land joined Allis's own land, then held by him from Benjamin Meller. The conveyance included all the fruits growing on the land and a dwelling house standing on it. Allis was to hold the house and the ten acres, with all appurtenances, from the date of the document for a term of eighteen years. During the term he was to pay any taxes or assessments that became due to the Honourable East India Company. Stevens bound himself and his successors to allow Allis and his successors to hold the parcel without any lawful hindrance from him or anyone acting through him. He set his hand and seal to the document on the day and year written above. Sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of John Draper, William Cliston and Richard Gurling.John Stevens, with a seal attached. Interpretations The reference to the year 1696 in the Hemmons to Allis agreement raises a chronological question similar to the one seen in the Ashby and Bodley transactions. The agreement was earlier described in its opening as articles of agreement between the two parties, with the date here recorded as 4 May 1696. The earlier Stevens to Allis lease in the same series of documents was dated 5 August 1689, so the chronological order of the underlying transactions has the Stevens lease coming first and the Hemmons sale coming second. The reference to the eighth year of King William's reign places the 1696 date within the regnal years of William the Third, since William and Mary's joint reign began in February 1689 and the eighth year would run from February 1696 to February 1697. |

|              |              | Sealed Signed & Deliv[d] in the presence of us John Draper W[m] Cliston Rich[d] Gurling Jn[o] Stevens [seal] | The reference to John Hemmons as still alive in 1696, executing the conveyance under his own name and signature, conflicts with the earlier 1682 inquest description of John Hemmons of Pleasant Valley. The Hemmons of the inquest had exchanged his land with Henry Coales, suggesting he was active at that earlier date, and his appearance here in 1696 indicates either that the same man continued in property dealings across the fourteen years, or that the name was carried by a son or other relative. The records do not resolve the question conclusively, but the recurrence of the Hemmons name in property transactions across multiple decades shows the persistence of the family within the island's settler society. The Stevens to Allis lease of 5 August 1689 is a fixed-term leasehold for eighteen years, with Allis paying £12 0s 0d for the entire term and assuming any taxes or assessments due to the company during that period. The eighteen-year term is unusual within the records reviewed, falling between the shorter terms of the Carne to Orchard seven-year lease and the much longer Rhodes to Cotgrave ninety-nine-year lease. The chosen length perhaps reflected a particular bargain between the parties about the value of the parcel over a specific horizon, with eighteen years offering enough time for Allis to recoup his investment while not committing the land for the very long term that nominal-rent leases like the Rhodes lease provided. The price of £12 0s 0d for eighteen years works out to less than fourteen shillings per year for the use of the parcel, a low effective rental compared to the £40 0s 0d that Bazett paid for ten acres in 1706 or the per-acre purchase prices seen in freehold transactions. The figure indicates that long-term leases at this date could be acquired for relatively modest sums, with the lessor giving up substantial use of the land in exchange for a single up-front payment. The arrangement matches the structure of the Rhodes to Cotgrave lease, where the lessor accepted a single cash sum plus a nominal rent in exchange for granting long-term possession. The Stevens lease shifts the obligation to pay taxes and assessments to Allis as lessee, in the same form seen in the Rhodes to Cotgrave lease where Cotgrave assumed the duties on lands and other assessments. The recurrence of this structure in two separate long-term leases shows that it was a standard feature of the island's leasehold arrangements. The lessor parted with the use of the land but kept clear of any continuing tax liability, with the lessee taking on whatever obligations the company or its successors might impose during the term. The boundary description identifying the parcel as adjoining Allis's own land then held by him from Benjamin Meller suggests that Allis had previously taken some interest in the Meller parcel, perhaps a lease or other holding. The reference indicates that Allis was building up a connected estate at the head of Deep Valley, with the Stevens lease extending his control over a contiguous block of land beyond his existing holding. The arrangement matches the broader pattern of consolidation seen throughout the records, with planters seeking to assemble continuous working blocks rather than scattered parcels. The presence of the same Benjamin Meller name as a former holder in both the Hemmons sale and the Stevens lease, with the parcels each described as adjoining land formerly held by him, indicates that Meller had been a substantial holder at the head of Deep Valley before relinquishing his interest. The disposal of his holdings through multiple separate transactions to different buyers, including the company through Hemmons's exchange and Stevens through the lease to Allis, points to a comprehensive break-up of his estate. The persistence of his name as the identifier of the parcels he had once held mirrors the broader pattern in |

Gurling features in the property transactions of the early 1700s as both a buyer and a seller of substantial holdings, and his appearance here as a witness in 1689 places him in the network of literate participants from an early date. William Cliston had also witnessed the Tomps to Allis stone house conveyance of 1688, indicating his sustained role in the formal conveyancing practice across the late 1680s. Speculations The eighteen-year term chosen for the Stevens to Allis lease perhaps reflects a deliberate selection of a term that would extend through Allis's active working years while not committing the property to him in perpetuity. The lease running from 1689 to 1707 would have covered the prime years of his agricultural activity at the head of Deep Valley, with the parcel returning to Stevens's heirs or successors at the end of the term. The structure gave Stevens a substantial cash payment for the eighteen-year use of the parcel while preserving the underlying freehold for the future, and gave Allis a defined period of secure tenure during which he could plan his investments and improvements. Thomas Allis's accumulation of property at the head of Deep Valley through multiple mechanisms, including the Stevens lease, the Hemmons purchase and the earlier connection to the Meller parcel, illustrates how a planter could build up a working estate through a combination of leasehold and freehold acquisitions. The mixed tenure of his holdings would have given him different rights and obligations in respect of each parcel, but all served the practical purpose of expanding his working land. The accumulation pattern matches the broader picture of estate-building seen across the records, with active planters seeking to consolidate their position through whatever legal mechanisms were available. The description of the leasehold as demised, granted and to farm let, using the standard English leasehold formula, indicates the formal continuity of conveyancing language with English practice. The phrase to farm let preserved the medieval English usage in which a lease for years was described as a farm or farming arrangement, even though the substance of the transaction was a property lease rather than an agricultural tenancy in any specific sense. The continuity of the language shows how the island's conveyancing practice transplanted established English forms without significant local modification. The inclusion of wood, trees, sprights and other growing material in the Hemmons to Allis transfer, alongside the more standard provisions, reflects the consistent attention to timber and growing produce that characterised many of the deeds in the records. The standard formula treated the entire growing substance of the land as part of the conveyance, with the buyer acquiring not only the underlying soil but everything growing on it. The repeated emphasis on these elements indicates their economic importance within the island's agricultural economy, where standing trees and crops formed a significant part of the value of any parcel. |

He acknowledged that he had received from Thomas Allis, free planter of the same island, the sum of £14 0s 0d in current money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the document. He acknowledged full payment and released Allis, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns from any further claim in respect of the sum. He gave, granted, alienated, bargained and sold to Allis of Deep Valley, his heirs and assigns for ever, a parcel of land of about ten acres in Deep Valley, joined to Allis's plantation. The conveyance included all ways, conveniences, profits and emoluments. The land was then in Allis's own occupation. Allis was to hold the parcel, with all appurtenances [...] Interpretations The Stephen Child quit-claim of 20 June 1704 records the release of a possible competing interest in the ten-acre parcel that Thomas Allis held in Deep Valley. Child paid Allis nothing for the quit-claim, instead receiving £3 0s 0d from Allis in consideration of his release. The structure shows that Allis was prepared to pay a modest sum to clear up any residual interest that Child might have had in the parcel, securing his title against the possibility of a future challenge. The arrangement reveals how quit-claims operated as protective instruments within the conveyancing system, with small payments made to obtain releases from anyone who might otherwise assert a claim. The identification of Stephen Child as gunner's mate connects him to the same garrison position that Thomas Goodwin had held in the 1690s and that John Clavering held in 1707. The recurring appearance of garrison personnel in property transactions confirms the active participation of military men in the island's land market. Child's potential claim against the Allis Deep Valley parcel suggests that he had some past connection to the property, perhaps as a former lessee or as an heir or relative of a previous holder, that needed to be formally extinguished to protect Allis's title. The parcel involved in the Child quit-claim is identified as formerly the lot of Benjamin Meller, soldier, the same Meller whose name appears in the Hemmons and Stevens transactions as a previous holder at the head of Deep Valley. The recurring reference to Meller as the original or earlier holder of multiple parcels at this location suggests that he had once held a substantial estate that subsequently dispersed through various transfers. The identification of Meller as a soldier in this quit-claim is consistent with his military status that had perhaps been the basis for his original allotment from the company. The presence of Daniel Griffeth as a witness to the Child quit-claim places the council clerk directly in the transaction. Griffeth had certified copies of many earlier deeds in the records reviewed, and his appearance here as a witness rather than as a certifier shows the dual roles that the clerk's office combined. The other witnesses were William Beale, whose name connects to the Beale family active in the 1682 inquest, and Sutton Isaack, also named in the 1682 records as a holder in Fishers Valley. The combination of witnesses places the |

|                    |                 |                   | transaction within the established network of literate participants in the formal property dealings on the island. The Benjamin Miller to Thomas Allis conveyance, of unspecified date in the text presented, transfers another ten-acre parcel in Deep Valley joined to Allis's plantation for £14 0s 0d. The transaction shows Allis adding yet another parcel to his accumulating Deep Valley estate, with the new acquisition extending his holding adjacent to land he already worked. The Miller from whom Allis bought this parcel is presumably the same Benjamin Miller, soldier, who appears in the earlier records as a major holder in Fishers Valley. The price of £14 0s 0d for the Miller ten acres gives a per-acre figure of £1 8s 0d, falling within the upper range of values for the area. The figure is higher than the £1 0s 0d per acre rate seen in many earlier transactions but consistent with the gradual appreciation of land values across the period covered by the records. The Miller parcel had been in Allis's occupation at the time of the conveyance, suggesting that Allis had been working the land under some previous arrangement, perhaps a lease, before purchasing the freehold outright. The naming of Allis as Thomas Allis of Deep Valley in the Miller conveyance places him as a recognised resident and landholder of the Deep Valley district by the date of this transaction. The geographical designation attached to his name confirms his settled status in the area, distinguishing him from any other Thomas Allis who might have been active elsewhere on the island. The phrase reveals the development of local identification through residence, with planters becoming associated with their principal districts in the formal documentation. Speculations The £3 0s 0d that Allis paid Child for the quit-claim represents a modest sum for the protection it provided against a potential title challenge. Allis would have judged that the risk of Child asserting a claim, however weak, against the parcel was worth removing through a small payment rather than leaving open the possibility of future litigation or disputed possession. The arrangement points to a careful approach by Allis to securing his accumulating Deep Valley estate, with every possible competing interest being formally extinguished to produce a clean title. The chain of identifications connecting Benjamin Meller as the original holder of the Deep Valley parcels to Stephen Child as a successor with some residual interest, and from Meller to Benjamin Miller as another sometime holder of related Deep Valley land, suggests a complex web of military allotments and family interests in the area. The parcels at the head of Deep Valley had moved through various military hands before reaching Allis, with the original allotments perhaps having been made to garrison members who later disposed of or assigned their interests. The accumulation by Allis brought multiple of these parcels into a single working estate. The repeated acquisitions by Allis at the head of Deep Valley, including the Hemmons purchase, the Stevens lease, the Child quit-claim and the Miller sale, illustrate the sustained estate-building strategy of an active planter over a period of nearly two decades. The transactions span from the Stevens lease of 1689 through the Hemmons sale of 1696 to the Child and Miller transactions of the early 1700s. The persistence of Allis's accumulation across this long period suggests both the longevity of his planting career on the island and his consistent focus on consolidating land in a particular district. The structural device of the quit-claim, used by Child to release any residual interest in the Allis parcel, |

The mechanism allowed potential disputes to be resolved through negotiation and recorded release rather than through court proceedings, with small payments exchanged for clean title. The recurring use of quit-claims in the records, seen also in the Henry Francis to Goodwin release of 1704, points to a well-developed practice of preventive title clearance within the island's property system.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

Benjamin Miller covenanted for himself and his successors that he had good right, full power and lawful authority to grant, bargain and sell the premises. He undertook to save Allis and his heirs harmless from any former bargains, sales, gifts, grants, forfeitures, penalties, titles, troubles, charges or encumbrances arising from any act done or suffered by him or by any other person. He warranted that Allis and his successors should hold and enjoy the land without any lawful eviction, hindrance or disturbance from Miller, his heirs, assigns or any person claiming through them. Miller bound himself and all others to warrant and defend the premises with their appurtenances. He set his hand and seal to the document on 3 April 1704. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Erasmus Pearliong, Thomas Cofon and Daniel Griffeth. Benjamin Miller, with a sign. Interpretations The Miller to Allis conveyance of 3 April 1704 completes a sustained sequence by which Thomas Allis built up his Deep Valley estate. The transaction adds the Miller ten acres to the parcels Allis had earlier acquired from Hemmons, leased from Stevens, and secured against any competing claim from Stephen Child. By the time of this 1704 conveyance, Allis had assembled a substantial connected holding at the head of Deep Valley through a combination of leases, purchases and quit-claims spanning fifteen years. The detailed warranty clauses in the Miller deed represent the most extensive title protection language seen in the records reviewed. Miller covenanted not only against his own acts but against the acts of anyone claiming through his title, and bound himself to save Allis harmless from former bargains, sales, gifts, grants, forfeitures, penalties, titles, troubles, charges and incumbrances. The comprehensive enumeration covered every conceivable form of competing claim or encumbrance that might affect the parcel, providing Allis with the fullest possible documentary protection against any future challenge. The breadth of the warranty perhaps reflects either the parties' awareness of the multi-layered history of the Deep Valley parcels or a general elaboration of conveyancing language in the early 1700s compared with earlier deeds. The phrase any Act done, or hereafter to be done, comitted or Voluntarily Suffered extends the warranty to future as well as past acts, with Miller committing himself and his successors to defend the title against any subsequent disposition or omission that might affect Allis's interest. The forward-looking element of the warranty would have allowed Allis to claim against Miller's estate if any future act by Miller or his heirs created a competing interest in the parcel. The clause shifted not only past but also future title risks to the seller, providing a comprehensive shield for the buyer's interest. |

|                    |                 |                   | The witnesses to the conveyance include Daniel Griffeth as clerk of the council, in the same role he played in the Stephen Child quit-claim of two months later. The other witnesses, Erasmus Pearliong and Thomas Cofon, are new names in the records reviewed and may indicate the involvement of additional literate participants whose property activities did not generate their own recorded transactions. The Pearliong name, with its unusual spelling, may indicate another settler of continental European origin, adding to the diversity of background suggested by names like Des Fontaines and Sortelben in other records. Benjamin Miller's identity in this conveyance connects to the Benjamin Miller of the 1682 inquest, who appears as the holder of a substantial parcel in Fishers Valley adjoining other holdings. The continuity of the name across the records, with Miller appearing as soldier in the 1704 conveyance, suggests that he had been a long-term settler on the island, perhaps the same man who held the original allotment two decades earlier or a son carrying the same name. The Miller name's persistence in property dealings across this period mirrors the broader pattern of family continuity in the island's settler society. The recording of Miller's signature in the original Latin formula Signum, meaning sign or mark, rather than as a written name or as a mark in the conventional form, indicates either that he signed by a personal device that the clerk recorded with the Latin term, or that the clerk used Latin to describe the form of authentication used. The unusual form contrasts with the standard recording of marks as X or other letters by the clerk in other deeds. The variation may reflect either the particular style of the clerk Griffeth in this transaction or a specific form of authentication used by Miller that differed from the more common marks. The £14 0s 0d that Allis paid Miller for the ten acres falls between the prices paid in his earlier Deep Valley acquisitions. The Stevens lease had cost £12 0s 0d for an eighteen-year term on ten acres, while the Hemmons purchase had cost £10 6s 0d for a freehold ten acres in 1696. The £14 0s 0d for the Miller parcel in 1704 reflects the upward movement of land values during the intervening years, with the per-acre rate of £1 8s 0d now standing well above the earlier figures. The pattern matches the general appreciation of land values seen across the records during the period from the 1680s to the 1700s. The phrase any Act done, or hereafter to be done, comitted or Voluntarily Suffered also reveals an awareness of the various ways in which title problems could arise. The wording covers not only positive acts of conveyance but also omissions or sufferings that might allow a third party to acquire rights through adverse possession, prescription or other means. The careful drafting indicates that the conveyancing practice on the island had developed beyond simple transfer language to address the full range of risks that could compromise a buyer's title over time. Speculations The very detailed warranty clauses in the Miller to Allis conveyance perhaps reflect the accumulated experience of the parties with the complications that could arise in establishing clean title to parcels with multiple historical claims. The Deep Valley parcels had moved through various military allottees, exchanges with the company, leases and sales, with the result that potential competing interests could lurk in the background of any title. Miller's willingness to give the extensive warranty, and Allis's insistence on receiving it, point to a shared understanding that the standard quiet enjoyment covenant was insufficient protection for a parcel with such a complicated history. |

The total acreage he had assembled, combining the various parcels traced in the records, would have been at least thirty acres of freehold and leasehold land in a single district. The pattern of sustained acquisition by a single buyer matches the parallel histories of accumulation by Thomas Goodwin, Matthew Bazett, Hoskinson and others, suggesting that the early 1700s saw active consolidation of land into the hands of leading settlers. The presence of Miller in this 1704 conveyance, identified still as a soldier, suggests that he remained in the garrison while disposing of his accumulated property holdings. The pattern matches the path of other military personnel who used their service pay and accumulated savings to acquire land during their active years and then sold or transferred their holdings later in their careers or as their circumstances changed. The combined participation of military and civilian holders in the island's property market produced the layered network of transactions visible across the records. The forward-looking warranty against future acts by Miller or his successors reveals a particular concern about the durability of the title transferred. Allis was acquiring not only the present interest in the parcel but a continuing guarantee against any subsequent dilution of his rights, with Miller and his estate bound to defend the title for the indefinite future. The structure points to a high level of legal sophistication in the island's conveyancing practice, with parties willing to commit themselves and their successors to long-term obligations in exchange for the substantial consideration paid at the time of the conveyance. |

The property was known as the Lemon Garden, and the lease covered the dwelling together with its garden, plantation, fencing, walls and enclosures, exactly as Margaret Cotgrave had held them. The premises lay in Chapel Valley near Fort James. The lease also included one and a half acres of the Company's waste land near the head of Chapel Valley, a short distance below the parcel held by the orphans of Jonathan Beale and known as the Purrlane Bed. Paul Graton, his executors, administrators and assigns took the property for an eighteen-year term, to run from the Feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary next following the date of the lease. The annual rent due to the Company was £30 7s 6d in island currency, payable each year on Lady Day, with the land duty included in that sum. Graton was bound to sell the produce of the Lemon Garden at fixed prices for the public good. Banana trees were to be sold at 6d each. Lemon juice was to be sold at 2s 6d per gallon. Lemons were to be sold at 3s 0d per hundred. Banana bunches were to be sold at 2s 6d each. The dry leaves were reserved to the Company for its own use. Graton bound himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns to keep the premises in good repair throughout the term and to surrender them at its end in equally good condition. The garden was not an ordinary plantation but a regulated source of antiscorbutic produce, valuable to the Company's ships calling at St Helena. By fixing retail prices for bananas, lemons, lemon juice and banana bunches in the lease itself, the Company turned a tenancy agreement into an instrument of price control, removing the tenant's commercial discretion over the very produce that made the holding profitable. The reservation of dry leaves to the Company is a small but telling provision. Dry banana and lemon leaves had practical uses in packing, thatching, fodder and wrapping. The clause shows that even the by-products of the garden were treated as Company property, with the tenant taking only what the lease expressly granted him. The rent of £30 7s 6d was a substantial sum for an eighteen-year term, and the inclusion of the land duty within the figure simplified collection. Lady Day, on 25 March, was the conventional English quarter day for rent and the start of the legal year, so the choice of date aligned the St Helena lease with metropolitan practice. The right of re-entry on non-payment is the Company's principal enforcement mechanism. Rather than pursuing the tenant for arrears, the Company could simply repossess the holding, which on a regulated commercial garden was a far heavier sanction than a money judgment. The clause reveals how landlordship and governmental authority combined in a single instrument on the island. Margaret Cotgrave, widow of John Cotgrave, had earlier held a Chapel Valley dwelling house bought by her late husband from Thomas Tewsdale in April 1694, and a 10-acre parcel at the head of Sharks Valley taken on a 99-year lease from Elizabeth Rhodes in October 1687. The Lemon Garden adds a third Cotgrave holding to the record and shows the household's footprint in the urban core of Chapel Valley before her death. The orphans of Jonathan Beale appear here as a boundary feature, holding the Purslane Bed near the head of Chapel Valley. Orphaned children retained named interests in land in their own right, and their parcel served as a fixed point of reference in subsequent leases. The Beale name connects forward to the Ellenor Beale legacy administered through William Chevalls and George Carne in 1707. The phrase Purslane Bed identifies a parcel by the herb cultivated on it. Purslane was valued as a fresh green and as a further antiscorbutic, and the naming pattern matches the Lemon Garden itself: holdings on Company waste were often identified by their dominant produce rather than by an owner's name. Speculations The structure of the lease suggests the Company was responding to a specific supply problem. Fresh fruit and lemon juice were essential against scurvy on the long passages between England, the Cape and India, and an unregulated tenant could have raised prices when shipping demand was high. By writing the retail prices into the lease, the Company guaranteed that arriving ships would find produce at a known rate, and the eighteen-year term gave the tenant enough security to invest in the garden's upkeep without the Company surrendering control of the pricing. The choice of Paul Graton as the new tenant after Margaret Cotgrave's death points to a deliberate transfer rather than an open market grant. The Lemon Garden carried both commercial value and a public-supply obligation, and the Company would have selected a planter judged capable of maintaining the trees, the walls and the fencing already established by the Cotgrave household. The lease preserves the existing |

The waste-land parcel falls outside the schedule of regulated produce, and Graton would have been free to use it as ordinary plantation ground while meeting his obligations on the Lemon Garden proper.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

The Governor and Company affixed the Common Seal to one part of the lease. Paul Graton set his hand and seal to the other. The lease was sealed and delivered on 23 December 1707. A memorandum was added after the lease was executed. The Governor and Council granted Paul Graton, his executors, administrators and assigns a further term of sixty-one years over the one and a half acres of waste land referred to in the lease. That extended term ran from 25 March following the date of the memorandum. A separate memorandum recorded a transaction between William French esquire and his wife Mary on the one part and George Hoskison, free planter of St Helena, on the other. The Frenches acknowledged receipt of £39 0s 0d in good current money paid in hand before the sealing of the deed. In return they demised and leased to Hoskison thirty acres of land formerly held by the late Thomas Box, together with 50,000 yams of about nine months' growth. The lease also covered a further ten acres adjoining the thirty, which William French held by lease from the Company at the head of Lemon Valley, with all appurtenances. The term was eleven years. William French or his heirs remained liable for the yearly rent and duty payable to the Company on all the land covered. In return for the lease, Hoskison undertook to deliver to William French and his wife 5,000 yams in each of the eleven years. At the end of the term Hoskison was to surrender the land and possessions in as good a condition as he had received them. The deed was signed, sealed and delivered on 24 July 1707 in the presence of Robert Keling and John Alexander. William French, Mary French and George Hoskison each set their hand and seal. Interpretations The sixty-one-year extension to Paul Graton's one and a half acres of waste land transforms what had been a marginal addition to the Lemon Garden lease into a near-perpetual holding. The eighteen-year main term was suited to a regulated commercial garden, but a sixty-one-year term on the upper parcel gave Graton the security to plant slow-growing crops or fruit trees on what had previously been Company waste. The decision mirrors the 99-year extension granted to Paul Charles in March 1705 over his Sandy Bay leasehold, and shows the Governor and Council willing to convert short tenures into long ones where a tenant proposed to develop unimproved ground. The French to Hoskison transaction is technically described as a lease, but the substance is a sub-lease combined with a yam-supply contract. William French retained the head-lease from the Company and remained the rent-paying tenant. Hoskison received possession for eleven years and the existing crop of 50,000 yams. The arrangement let French raise £39 0s 0d in cash without surrendering his Company tenancy |

Hoskison's obligation to deliver 5,000 yams a year for eleven years made yams function as the rent in kind, separate from the £39 0s 0d cash consideration paid at signing. Total deliveries amounted to 55,000 yams over the life of the lease, set against an initial stock of 50,000 yams transferred at the start. The structure gave the Frenches a steady food rent rather than a money rent. The arrangement reinforces the role of yams as the principal subsistence commodity on the island, used both as currency-equivalent in earlier deeds and as the working medium of plantation agreements. The earlier composite arrangement of 4 March 1708 between the same William and Mary French and Edward Bagley involved similar features: a thirty-acre Box parcel, a ten-acre Company leasehold and reservations over grazing and produce. The July 1707 lease to Hoskison precedes that arrangement by less than eight months, and the same forty-acre block at the head of Lemon Valley appears in both. The continuity of liability for the Company rent and duty kept the formal tenancy in William French's name. The clause shielded the Company from any difficulty in collecting rent from a sub-tenant, since the head-lessee remained the responsible party. The mechanism is a standard early-modern device for protecting a landlord against unwanted privity with under-tenants. Robert Keling appears here as a witness alongside John Alexander. The Keling or Keeling name had earlier surfaced through the late Governor Keeling, whose heirs held land near Fryer Valley, and through Ellinor Keeling, daughter-in-law of George Carne. Robert Keling's appearance shows the family continuing to take part in the formal life of the register two decades after the governor's tenure. Speculations The same-day pairing of the eighteen-year Lemon Garden lease and the sixty-one-year extension to its waste-land annex suggests the original lease was drafted as a unit and then split into two instruments to keep the regulated commercial garden and the unregulated upland parcel on different legal footings. The Lemon Garden carried a public-supply obligation tied to ship victualling and was always going to be tightly controlled, but the upper parcel had no such function, and a longer term was an inducement to plant it out. The Frenches' decision to take £39 0s 0d in cash plus an annual yam rent rather than a single capital sum points to a household needing both ready money and a continuous food supply. A pure sale would have given them more cash but no provisions, while a pure yam contract would have given provisions but no money for other outlays. The hybrid structure addressed both needs at once, and the eleven-year term gave time for the yam beds to be replanted on a rolling basis under Hoskison's management. The matching of 50,000 yams in the initial transfer against 55,000 yams in the rent over eleven years implies a deliberate calculation. Hoskison was being asked to return slightly more than he received, which placed the burden of replanting and cultivation squarely on him while preserving the underlying yam stock for the Frenches at the end of the term. The numbers suggest an awareness on both sides of how much a forty-acre block could be expected to produce under continuous working. |

To the west it bounded the land of Edward Suffolk. The price was a composite payment in three currencies and in kind: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>Cash in sterling £24 0s 0d</li> <li>Spanish dollars 40 dollars</li> <li>Cattle £14 0s 0d, valued by two impartial appraisers</li> </ul> The whole sum was due on 7 September following the date of the deed. Fewsdale conveyed the land with all its appurtenances to Bevean, his heirs and assigns for ever, and covenanted that Bevean and his successors would enjoy the property without disturbance from Fewsdale or any person claiming through him. He warranted the title free of any earlier gift, grant, bargain, sale or bequest. The deed was made on 7 December 1686, in the second year of the reign of King James the Second. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of Robert Tomps, Lester Sexton, Edward Bless and William Mellong. Thomas Fewsdale signed by his mark in the form of T. Interpretations The three-part purchase price reveals the practical limits of any single medium of exchange on the island. Sterling cash was scarce, Spanish dollars circulated through the trade routes to and from the Indies, and cattle were the most readily available store of value among the planters themselves. Splitting the consideration across all three let buyer and seller match the payment to what each could realistically gather, and the structure echoes the later Draper to Maxwell deed of 29 November 1699, in which £18 0s 0d was paid half in cattle at appraisal and half in Spanish dollars at 6s per dollar. The use of two impartial appraisers to value the cattle is a standing feature of island practice. Cattle could not be priced by simple count because age, condition and sex affected value, and the appraisers gave both parties a binding figure without the need for a market sale. The mechanism resembles arbitration in miniature and avoided the disputes that direct negotiation over individual beasts would have produced. The boundary description identifies the land by reference to its eastern and western neighbours rather than by survey measurement. Peter Williams's former ten-acre lot, then held by James Wakefield, gives the eastern boundary, and Edward Suffolk's land gives the western. The persistence of Williams's name as a descriptor, even though Wakefield was in possession, follows the standard butting-and-bordering convention seen in the 1682 inquest, where original allottees continued to identify parcels long after they had changed hands. Owen Bevean, who took the land here, was the father-in-law of Thomas Goodwin. The 1684 Company grant to Bevean of twenty acres bordering John Cole, and the 1705 family settlement transferring that grant to Goodwin after Bevean and his wife's deaths, established the Bevean holding as one of the foundations of the Goodwin estate. The Sandy Bay parcel acquired here in December 1686 adds a second tract to the Bevean holdings and shows the household consolidating land on two sides of the island, the Lemon Valley side from the Company in 1684 and the Sandy Bay side from Fewsdale in 1686. James Wakefield's name on the eastern boundary connects the Sandy Bay parcel to the broader Wakefield holding that runs through the Little Horsepad records. John Young of the 24 May 1693 deed sold eight acres at Little Horsepad described as part of Wakefield's lot, and Edward Crosbey's 19 March 1695 sale completed Goodwin's reassembly of the same lot. The Suffolk name therefore appears as both a boundary marker here and as the source of a separate ten-acre parcel later passing into Goodwin hands, suggesting Suffolk had held more than one allotment on the island. Speculations The deferred payment date of 7 September, nine months after the conveyance, suggests Fewsdale was prepared to wait for the harvest cycle to complete before taking his cash, dollars and cattle. Spring and early summer would have been the season for cattle to recover condition after the cooler months and for planters to assemble Spanish dollars from any trade with passing ships. The choice of September as the payment date appears tied to the rhythm of island economic activity rather than to any abstract legal quarter. The conveyance for ever, with the specific warranty against earlier gifts, grants, bargains, sales or bequests, points to an awareness that Sandy Bay parcels had passed through many hands. The 1682 inquest recorded Cleverlee, Long, Price, Phillips, Lawson and Steward as participants in Sandy Bay transactions, and Fewsdale's clear undertaking that no earlier disposition encumbered the land was meant to protect Bevean against the kind of latent claim that the quit-claims of 1704 and 1707 were later used to extinguish. The conveyance falls outside the Goodwin family's direct dealings, since Goodwin himself does not appear here. Bevean was acting in his own right in December 1686, almost twenty years before the family settlement to his son-in-law, and the Sandy Bay acquisition shows the Bevean household building its own estate independently of the later Goodwin connection. The conveyance therefore documents Bevean as a substantial planter in his own right, not merely as the father-in-law through whom the Lemon Valley grant later passed. |

Trapp acknowledged further unspecified causes and considerations as part of the reason for the sale. Goodwin took the messuage, plantation, ten acres, slave and hogs with all profits and commodities belonging to the property. Interpretations The Bevean gift of 1 February 1690 sits chronologically between the two earlier landmarks of the Bevean estate. The 1684 Company grant to Bevean of twenty acres bordering John Cole gave him his Lemon Valley anchor parcel, and the December 1686 Fewsdale conveyance gave him the Sandy Bay parcel under Lemon Valley Rock. The 1690 gift to John Goodwin transferred a separate ten-acre parcel with a house, plantation and timber trees, and shows the Bevean household already redistributing its accumulated holdings to the next generation while Bevean himself was still active. The 1705 family settlement transferring the 1684 Company grant to Thomas Goodwin therefore stands as a second stage in a longer process, not as the first transfer from Bevean to the Goodwin line. The presence of T Goodwin as the sole named witness to the gift, with no register or clerk attesting the deed, indicates a household instrument drawn within the immediate family circle. T Goodwin was Thomas Goodwin, who by 1690 was already an established figure on the island and would soon move from witness to principal in his own right with his Little Horsepad purchase from John Young in May 1693. The witnessing role here precedes by three years his earliest recorded purchase and confirms his presence in family affairs well before he began assembling his own estate. The Trapp to Goodwin sale of 10 February 1690 is notable for its inclusion of a named slave as part of the composite consideration. Asher is identified by name within the deed itself, alongside the eight head of hogs, the messuage, the plantation, the ten acres and the appurtenances. The naming of an individual slave in a land conveyance is unusual within the registers, where slaves more commonly appear in inventories or in separate bills of sale rather than as itemised property within a freehold transfer. The structure shows the Trapp household selling a working unit, with the land, the dwelling, the livestock and the labour transferred together as a single going concern. Payment by bills of exchange drawn on the commanders of returning ships reveals how planters realised value from the East India trade without holding sterling cash on the island. A bill drawn on a ship's commander was an instruction to pay the bearer when the vessel reached London, and the commander's credit stood behind the instrument. The mechanism allowed island sellers to convert local assets into sterling claims payable in England, which was a more useful form of liquidity than coin held on St Helena. The 25 December completion date for the payment matches the standard quarter day for sterling accounts, and shows Trapp expecting the bills to be honoured within the metropolitan settlement cycle rather than on any island timetable. The choice contrasts with the September completion date used in the 1686 Fewsdale to Bevean deed, where payment was tied to the island harvest, and reflects the difference between a transaction priced in island cattle, dollars and sterling and one priced wholly in sterling instruments. The late John Greentree appears as the neighbouring landholder, fixing the position of the Trapp parcel at the head of Lemon Valley. John Greentree of the 27 April 1698 conveyance later sold a twenty-acre parcel in Lemon Valley to Mrs Elizabeth Johnson, described as the lot of the late John Greentree. The two references together indicate that the Greentree name attached to more than one Lemon Valley parcel, |

The Bevean gift brought ten acres with a house, plantation and timber trees from his father-in-law on 1 February, and the Trapp purchase brought a further ten acres with a messuage, plantation, slave and hogs on 10 February. Goodwin therefore moved from a position with no recorded freehold on the island to holder of two adjoining or near-adjoining ten-acre parcels in a matter of days, and the timing points to deliberate household planning rather than coincidence. The choice to take Asher as part of the composite Trapp transaction rather than as a separate bill of sale points to a particular intention on Goodwin's side. By incorporating the slave into the land conveyance, Goodwin secured the labour needed to work the new holding without a separate negotiation and without separate witnesses or a separate price. The structure also meant that Asher's transfer was sealed with the same instrument that transferred the house, the hogs and the land, which gave a single document evidentiary weight over the entire working unit. The unspecified divers other good causes and considerations referred to in the Trapp deed suggest the £35 0s 0d in sterling bills was not the whole story. Such language typically covered a side arrangement that the parties preferred not to record in detail. Possible side arrangements include forgiveness of an earlier debt, a counter-promise from Goodwin to Trapp on another matter, or a kinship or service consideration that the parties wished to leave outside the formal price. The phrasing was a standard early-modern device for keeping such matters out of the written record while preserving their legal weight as consideration. |

The deed was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of John Fuller, who signed by his mark in the form of EF, Israel Hadles, John Smith and T Goodwin. Joseph Trapp set his hand and seal on the same day and year as the body of the deed. A separate writing was made on the island of St Helena by Prudence Sherwin, wife and attorney of Thomas Sherwin, planter of the island. Prudence acted under a letter of attorney from her husband. She sold to Thomas Goodwin a tenement house in Chapel Valley Town for £26 0s 0d in lawful current money of the island. The sum was paid in full before the deed was sealed, and Prudence acknowledged the receipt and discharged Goodwin and his heirs from any further claim. The tenement stood opposite the Company's storehouse, with the house of John Fuller to the south and the house of the late Richard Gurling to the north. Prudence was in possession of the tenement at the time of the sale, holding it under the power conferred by her husband's letter of attorney. Goodwin and his heirs took the tenement with all its buildings and appurtenances to their own use and behoof for ever. Prudence warranted the title against her husband, against his and her own heirs, executors and assigns, and against all other claimants. Interpretations Prudence Sherwin's authority to sell rests entirely on her letter of attorney from her absent husband.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

The deed reveals how married women on the island exercised legal capacity through the express delegation of marital authority, rather than through any independent right, and the structure mirrors Elizabeth Rhodes's lease of the Rhodes plantation to John Cotgrave in October 1687, where the wife acted as attorney for her absent husband. The chain of attorney-led conveyances now includes three identifiable instances in which a wife acted for an absent husband: Elizabeth Rhodes for William Rhodes in 1687, Prudence Sherwin for Thomas Sherwin recorded here, and Mary Carne for George Carne in January 1705. The mechanism filled a gap that the rhythm of trade between St Helena, England and the Indies created, since husbands frequently travelled on Company shipping or were detained at other stations for long periods. The letter of attorney let the household continue to dispose of land and houses in the husband's absence without waiting for his return. Thomas Goodwin's witnessing of the Bevean gift on 1 February 1690 and the Trapp sale on 10 February 1690, combined with this purchase from Prudence Sherwin, marks a sustained involvement in family and property affairs across the early 1690s before his own first recorded purchase from John Young in May 1693. The Chapel Valley tenement bought from Sherwin is therefore an earlier acquisition than the Little Horsepad parcel and revises the picture of Goodwin's estate-building. He was already acquiring urban property in Chapel Valley Town before he began the rural reassembly of the Wakefield lot. The location of the tenement opposite the Company's storehouse places it in the commercial heart of Chapel Valley Town. The storehouse was the receiving and issuing point for Company goods on the island, and properties facing it carried both a residential and a commercial value. The choice of John Fuller and the late Richard Gurling as the neighbouring boundary holders, with Fuller to the south and Gurling to the north, establishes the urban frontage line along which the Company's main store stood opposite a row of free-planter houses. Richard Gurling appears here as deceased, which fixes the deed at a point after his death. His later namesake, also Richard Gurling, was the seller of the small Chapel Valley plot to George Carne on 5 May 1704 and of the £500 composite estate to George Hoskinson on 12 October 1706. The later Richard Gurling is described in the registers as having held two acres at the head of Lemon Valley that had belonged to his late father, and the deceased neighbour referred to here is probably that father. John Fuller as southern neighbour links the tenement to the rural side of Fuller's holdings. He had earlier bought ten acres from Philip Savage on 20 March 1686 and witnessed the Bevean to Goodwin transfer of 22 September 1705 by his mark in the form of F. The Fuller name therefore appears as both a rural neighbour to Bevean and an urban neighbour to Sherwin's tenement, indicating a household with property on both sides of the divide between Chapel Valley Town and the upland plantations. Speculations The pricing of the tenement at £26 0s 0d in island currency, against the £130 0s 0d sterling paid by Thomas Goodwin to Edward Edmunds for a Chapel Valley town tenement on 10 May 1700, points to a marked difference in the scale and substance of the two properties. The Sherwin tenement was a modest house |

The Sherwin purchase therefore looks like an early-career acquisition by Goodwin, made while he was still working as a junior member of the garrison, and the Edmunds purchase a decade later reflects his accumulated capital as gunner's mate and deputy storekeeper. Prudence Sherwin's decision to sell the tenement while her husband was absent indicates either pressure on the household for ready money or a deliberate disposal in advance of his return. The acknowledgement that the £26 0s 0d had been paid in full before the deed was sealed shows that she received the cash in hand and would have had immediate use of it. The arrangement gave her funds during her husband's absence without committing him to any continuing obligation, since the freehold passed cleanly to Goodwin with no further payment due. The warranty against Thomas Sherwin himself, in addition to the warranty against the wife, the joint heirs and any third party, suggests an awareness on Goodwin's side that the husband might return and dispute the sale. The letter of attorney was the legal foundation for Prudence's act, but a returning husband could attempt to deny that the instrument extended to the specific tenement or to argue that his wife had acted beyond its terms. The double-barrelled warranty closes off both possibilities and binds the husband by his own attorney's act as effectively as if he had executed the deed himself.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

The deed was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of James Dofse and John Goodwin. Prudence signed by her mark in the form of M. Thomas Dixon, sergeant of St Helena, sold to James Casthope, soldier of the island, ten acres of land for £15 0s 0d in island currency. The sum was paid in full before the deed was sealed and delivered, and Dixon acknowledged its receipt. The ten acres lay near the head of Lemon Valley. They formed the lower part of a thirty-acre block that Dixon had earlier bought from the Company, the land having previously been held by Thomas Allison, free planter of the island. Casthope and his heirs took the parcel with all fruits growing on it and all appurtenances belonging to it, to be held, occupied and enjoyed at their own pleasure. Dixon covenanted that Casthope would hold the land free of any claim, eviction, disturbance or interruption from Dixon, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, or from any other person acting through them. The deed was sealed and delivered on 6 January 1700 in the presence of James Bookey and John Alexander. Thomas Dixon set his hand and seal to it. A memorandum was added to the deed. It limited Casthope's boundary to the old ditch, allowing him to take no land beyond that line. If the area enclosed by the existing ditch fell short of the full ten acres, Casthope was to make up the shortfall from another part of the block, on the side towards Mr Thomas Goodwin's land. Interpretations The Dixon to Casthope deed reveals how the Company's role as land bank generated a secondary market in former allottee parcels. Thomas Allison had originally held the thirty acres, and the Company had taken it back into its own hands before re-granting it to Dixon. Dixon's resale of the lower ten acres to Casthope therefore moved a parcel through three distinct phases of ownership: allottee, Company, |

The pattern shows the Company actively redistributing land between planters and members of the garrison, with sergeants and soldiers acquiring land as part of the broader process of military settlement on the island. The memorandum limiting Casthope to the old ditch is the operative provision of the deed beyond the bare conveyance. The boundary in the field was already physically marked by a ditch, and the memorandum gave that ditch legal force as the line of separation between the lower ten and the upper twenty acres. If the area enclosed by the ditch proved less than the contracted ten acres, the shortfall was to be made up from the block running towards Goodwin's land, which fixed the direction of any reconfiguration in advance. The mechanism prevented the kind of dispute that would have arisen if measurement at completion produced an unexpected shortfall, since the parties had agreed in advance on both the boundary and the remedy. Thomas Allison appears here as the original allottee of the thirty acres at the head of Lemon Valley. The 1682 inquest had recorded a Thomas Alleison in Fryer Valley as a western neighbour to John Coles, and a separate Thomas Allison in the boundary description of Owen Bevan's 1684 Company grant on the south. The Allison name persisted across at least three parcels in different parts of the island, and the surrender of his thirty acres at the head of Lemon Valley to the Company points either to his death or to a deliberate handing back of land that had become a burden to maintain. The reference to Mr Thomas Goodwin's land identifies the eastern neighbour by his courtesy title. The Mr in 1700 marks Goodwin's standing in the community at a point when his recorded offices were gunner's mate and, by 1696, deputy storekeeper. The 1703 deed of William French would name him captain, deputy governor and storekeeper, but in January 1700 he was already a recognised landholder at the head of Lemon Valley, with the Dixon-Casthope parcel running up to his boundary. James Casthope appears here on 6 January 1700 as a soldier acquiring ten acres at the head of Lemon Valley. His earlier movements within the records show a different rural focus: the 1687 purchase from Joseph Pratt of ten acres with a house, the 1694 sale of those same ten acres to Ripin Wells, and the 1694 purchase from Thomas Harper of twenty acres at the head of Sarahs Valley with a house. The Lemon Valley acquisition therefore opens a new line of holdings on a third valley, and shows Casthope continuing to build a working estate across the upper plantations. Speculations The choice of 6 January as the date for completion of the Dixon-Casthope sale falls within the standard Christmas and Epiphany cycle of island legal business. The autumn of 1699 had also seen James Draper sell a messuage near Fort James to Samuel Maxwell on 29 November, and the broader pattern points to a clustering of formal conveyances in the late autumn and early winter months. The quarter ran towards Lady Day on 25 March, and a January completion gave both parties almost three full months before the next quarter day to settle any outstanding obligations on the land. Dixon's decision to sell only the lower ten of his thirty acres suggests an intention to retain the larger upper portion for his own use while raising £15 0s 0d in cash. The lower part of a Lemon Valley parcel would have been the more easily worked ground, with access to whatever watercourse ran from the head of the valley, while the upper twenty acres ran towards the higher and rougher slopes. The retention of the larger block of higher ground points to Dixon viewing the |
