A ten-acre parcel marked out by ditching and boundary description but not by precise survey would routinely show a small discrepancy when measured, and the explicit direction in which the shortfall was to be taken indicates a prior agreement between Dixon, Casthope and perhaps Goodwin himself on how the line would run if the ditch fell short. The clause therefore documents an informal three-party understanding rather than a simple bilateral transaction.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

The price was £10 0s 0d, paid in hand and acknowledged by Casthope at sealing. The conveyance was made on 9 February 1702 and was sealed and delivered in the presence of John Tackenall, Edward Edmunds and Thomas Goodwin. Casthope signed by his mark in the form of X. A separate gift was made by Sutton Isaack, free planter of St Helena, to his grandson Stephen Audouart, son of Bartrant Audouart, the Company's smith on the island. Isaack acted from love and affection for the child, with other lawful considerations also moving him. The gift covered the following two parcels: One acre of land part of Isaack's lot, lying above his dwelling house and under the Great Wood Ridge upon a plain A small piece of common free ground of sufficient extent to build a house for the grandson and his heirs Stephen Audouart and his heirs took the property to their own use for ever, with full power of disposal once he came of age. During his minority, possession of the one-acre parcel was to remain with his father Bartrant Audouart, who was to manure and plant it as he thought fit until the child reached his majority. If Stephen Audouart died during his minority, both parcels were to pass to Bartrant Audouart and his heirs for ever. The deed was sealed on 29 October 1698 in the presence of Henry Coales, James Drayper and Matthew Bazett. Sutton Isaack set his hand and seal to it. Interpretations The Casthope to Goodwin sale of 9 February 1702 closes a sequence that began with Allison's original allotment, ran through the Company's reabsorption of the parcel, continued through Dixon's purchase of the thirty acres and his sale of the lower ten to Casthope, and now brings the ten acres into Goodwin's hands. Casthope had paid £15 0s 0d to Dixon in January 1700 and received £10 0s 0d from Goodwin two years later, a loss of £5 0s 0d on the cash price. The drop suggests Casthope was realising the parcel at less than he had paid for it, and the timing relative to the memorandum's boundary uncertainty raises the possibility that the working area enclosed by the old ditch had proved less productive than expected. Edward Edmunds appears as a witness here in February 1702, just over two years before his sale of the large Chapel Valley tenement to Goodwin for £130 0s 0d sterling on 10 May 1700. The chronology established by the registers therefore shows Edmunds as a witness to Goodwin's rural Lemon Valley acquisitions while their major urban transaction had already been completed, and the Henry Francis quit-claim of 27 January 1704 reveals the family relationship between Edmunds and his son-in-law Francis. The witness role |

|                    |                 |                   | here confirms a continuing connection between the Edmunds and Goodwin households across both urban and rural land dealings. Sutton Isaack's gift to his grandson Stephen Audouart establishes a settlement designed to keep land within a single line of descent across three generations. The instrument names the grandfather, the father and the grandson, and provides for the descent to skip the parent in the ordinary course while routing through him if the child predeceases his own majority. The structure preserves the parental household's interest only as a fallback against premature death, and the controlling intention is that the land should rest with the grandson once he reaches full age. The reservation to Bartrant Audouart of the right to manure and plant the one-acre parcel during his son's minority gave the father effective possession without the underlying ownership. The father therefore had the use and produce of the land for the duration of the child's minority, but no power to alienate it, and the working capital invested in the parcel during those years would inure to the benefit of the grandson on his majority. The mechanism is a small-scale version of the use of trusts in English property practice, with the father holding as a custodian for the child rather than as an absolute owner. Bartrant Audouart's office as the Company's smith on the island fixes the household in a particular institutional position. The smith was responsible for ironwork, repairs and tool-making for the garrison and the planters, and the office combined a fixed Company wage with the practical authority that came from being the only specialist of his kind. The gift from his father-in-law therefore moves a planter's land into a household whose head holds a Company office, and the Audouart name appears here for the first time in the records as a settled family with its own line of descent. The phrase common free ground identifies the second parcel as land open to all the free planters, rather than as part of any single allottee's plot. The grant of an area sufficient to build a house on the common ground suggests that the household could mark out the necessary plot from unimproved land near Isaack's lot, with the planted acre serving as the principal holding and the house plot as its residential adjunct. The mechanism shows the Company tolerating informal subdivision of common ground for residential use, provided the parcel was attached to an existing planter household. Speculations The decision to make the gift in October 1698 rather than at some later occasion suggests Sutton Isaack was responding to a specific household circumstance, perhaps his own advancing age or a particular settlement of accounts within the family. By gifting the land while he was still alive and present, he secured the descent of the parcel through his daughter's marriage into the Audouart household and avoided the risk that his own death intestate or under a contested will would expose the parcel to claims from other heirs. The structure routes the land through the daughter and her husband to the grandson, but does so by passing it directly to the grandson with a parental custodianship, which keeps it free of any claim by Bartrant Audouart's own line beyond his immediate household. The choice of the area above Isaack's dwelling house and under the Great Wood Ridge, rather than a parcel from his more accessible ground, points to a deliberate selection of land that would be developed by the next generation rather than worked alongside his own. The parcel sits at the upper edge of his lot, separated from his own dwelling by the slope of the ground, and would have functioned as the foundation of a new household for the grandson rather than as an |

The selection therefore tells against any reading of the gift as a mere subdivision of working land for present use. The Casthope to Goodwin sale at £5 0s 0d below the price Casthope had paid two years earlier may be explained by the boundary uncertainty preserved in the original memorandum. Casthope had been entitled to make up any shortfall from the side towards Goodwin's land, but the cleaner solution was to sell the parcel onward to Goodwin himself. Goodwin, holding the eastern neighbouring tract, could absorb the ten acres into his own working unit without the need to test the old ditch line in any practical way, and Casthope took the lower price as the cost of avoiding a survey dispute he was unlikely to win against his more powerful neighbour.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

The land lay in Sharks Valley and had earlier been bought by Dweight from Robert Marsh, with the detail of that purchase entered at an earlier page in the register. The price was £170 0s 0d, paid in hand or secured to be paid. Dweight also assigned to Belvard his lease and right over a further six acres of land with the provisions on it, which he held by hire from the Honourable United English East India Company. Belvard and his heirs were to take possession from 1 August 1708 next following the date of the deed, to hold for ever of the chief lords of the fee by the services formerly due and accustomed. The deed was made on 8 June 1708 and witnessed by Thomas Goodwin, governor, Edward Walkborne, deputy governor, and William Marsden, third in council. George Dweight and Walter Belvard each signed. A separate memorandum recorded a transaction on the same day between William Marsh, free planter of St Helena, and George Dweight. Marsh sold to Dweight a tenement house in Chapel Valley, standing next to the house of Mrs Hays, with all appurtenances. The price was £30 0s 0d, paid in hand or secured to be paid. Possession was to pass to Dweight and his heirs from 25 June 1708. Marsh undertook to save Dweight and his heirs harmless from any claim by other persons. The deed was made on 8 June 1708 and witnessed by the same three council members: Thomas Goodwin, Edward Walkborne and William Marsden. A note added to the memorandum recorded that the house had formerly belonged to Thomas Heepedant. William Marsh signed by his mark in the form of W. Interpretations The Dweight to Belvard sale of 8 June 1708 brings George Dweight's holding in Sharks Valley to a close. The valley had been the focus of his earlier dealings: his ten acres recorded at the 20 February 1703 entry, the watercourse grant from his daughter-in-law Sarah Sensney on 13 March 1704, and the confirmation deed from Robert Marsh on 29 August 1705 for £8 16s 0d. The £170 0s 0d paid by Belvard represents a substantial appreciation over the £8 16s 0d Marsh had received as the confirmation price for the underlying ten acres, and the difference reflects the addition of a tenement house, the provisions growing on the ground and the assignment of the Company leasehold over a further six acres. The combined transfer of freehold and Company leasehold in a single instrument is the operative feature of the deed. Dweight held the ten acres as his own and the six acres on a lease from the Company, and the sale to Belvard moved both interests across by assignment. |

|                    |                 | george Dweight | The structure mirrors the assignment Edward Heath made to Paul Charles on 13 March 1705, where an unexpired Company lease over Sandy Bay land was transferred as part of a larger disposition, and shows how leasehold and freehold interests could be packaged together for a single composite price. The reference to the chief lords of the fee and the services formerly due preserves a medieval English form of tenure language that had little practical content on St Helena. There were no actual chief lords on the island other than the Company itself, and the services accustomed had long been notional. The phrasing continues to appear in island deeds because the registers were modelled on English freehold practice, and the form was kept even where the substance had no application beyond the Company's own conditions of grant. The witnessing of both deeds by Thomas Goodwin as governor, Edward Walkborne as deputy governor and William Marsden as third in council shows the council taking an active role in the formal recording of significant transactions. The pattern points to a developing system in which substantial conveyances were treated as matters of public record sealed in the presence of the governing body rather than purely private bargains. The same three men appear in the same order on both deeds, confirming a session of council business in which the Dweight transactions were processed together. William Marsh's sale of the Chapel Valley tenement to Dweight on the same day completes a circular exchange between the two families. The Marsh and Dweight households had been linked since 1703 through the Edward Gardener inheritance, in which William Marsh sold parcels of his son Robert's land to both William Dufton and George Dweight, and Robert Marsh subsequently confirmed the sales on reaching his majority in 1705. The June 1708 transactions reverse the earlier flow: Dweight sold his Sharks Valley land to Belvard for £170 0s 0d and bought Marsh's Chapel Valley tenement for £30 0s 0d, while Marsh moved from being a seller of rural land to being a seller of an urban property. Edward Walkborne appears in the registers here as deputy governor, taking the office that Thomas Goodwin had held before his elevation to the governorship. The transition between the two men is therefore visible in the witness lines of these deeds, with Goodwin moving up to the principal seat and Walkborne stepping into the deputy's role. The 18 December 1707 register-recopying attestation had named Goodwin, Edward Washborne and William Marsden among the witnesses, with the Washborne name probably the same person who appears six months later as Walkborne. The Marsh-Dweight memorandum note recording that the Chapel Valley tenement had formerly belonged to Thomas Heepedant gives the property's earlier history in a single line. The names attached to Chapel Valley tenements often passed through three or four hands within a generation, and the practice of noting the previous holder in the conveyance preserved a working chain of title without the need to assemble all the earlier deeds. The Heepedant name does not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed so far, and the note is probably the only surviving reference to his tenure of the house. Speculations Dweight's decision to convert his Sharks Valley holding into cash in June 1708 suggests preparation for a move to Chapel Valley Town. The £30 0s 0d he paid for the Marsh tenement was a small fraction of the £170 0s 0d he received from Belvard, leaving him a substantial cash margin of £140 0s 0d from the day's |

The structure points to a deliberate downsizing of his physical holdings and a release of capital, perhaps in anticipation of departure from the island or of retirement from active planting into a town household. The disparity between Robert Marsh's confirmation price of £8 16s 0d in 1705 and Belvard's purchase price of £170 0s 0d in 1708 reflects the difference between the bare ten acres and the working unit Dweight had built around it. The watercourse grant from Sarah Sensney in 1704 secured water for the plantation, and the construction or acquisition of the tenement house and the development of provisions on the ground transformed the holding from a rural parcel into a productive estate. The accompanying assignment of the Company leasehold over six adjacent acres extended the working area without committing Dweight to its purchase, and the combination of all these elements explains the price Belvard was prepared to pay. The choice to date the Dweight-Belvard possession from 1 August rather than from the date of the deed gives Dweight roughly seven weeks to gather the provisions then growing on the land and to remove his household effects. The 25 June date set for Dweight's entry into the Chapel Valley tenement gives him a parallel five weeks to take possession of the urban property and prepare it for residence. The staggered dates therefore document a planned move from rural Sharks Valley to urban Chapel Valley across the summer months of 1708, with the two transactions timed to dovetail rather than to overlap awkwardly.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

|                    |                 |                   | Box land being parcelled and reparcelled in multiple directions across a single twelve-month period. The transfer of any future right Bevia might acquire from the death of his wife's brothers or sisters is the operative novelty of the deed. Bevia held no present interest in any such expectancy, but the clause assigned in advance whatever portion of his wife's family estate might descend through her on the death of her siblings. The mechanism is an assignment of a future contingent interest, and it allowed Hoskison to consolidate not only the present parcel but also any reversionary share that Bevia would acquire through his marriage. The structure is unusual in the registers and shows the Bevia household releasing all its present and future Box-related claims in a single instrument. The Hoskison to Gurling mortgage is technically described as a mortgage but functions as an annuity for the life of Mary Hoskison. Gurling took the forty-five acres into his possession for the lifetime of Mary, while George Hoskison received £11 10s 0d each year from Gurling during her life. The structure inverts the ordinary direction of a mortgage, since the lender Gurling here pays the borrower Hoskison, and the security is the use of the land rather than its capital value. The arrangement is therefore better described as a lease for a life with an annuity rent, framed in the language of mortgage. The exception of the plantations from the mortgage preserved Hoskison's right to the existing crops, trees and improvements on the ground. Gurling took the land itself for cultivation during the term, but the standing plantations remained Hoskison's. The structure separated the underlying soil from the worked produce in a way that protected Hoskison's investment in the established crops while letting Gurling enjoy the use of the bare land. The choice of Mary Hoskison's life as the measuring period for the term rather than George Hoskison's own life shifts the actuarial risk between the parties. If Mary outlived George, Gurling continued to enjoy possession and to pay the annuity to George's estate. If Mary died before George, the term ended and the land returned to Hoskison's direct possession during his own remaining years. The arrangement therefore tied the financial structure to the wife's lifetime and indicates that her age, health or position within the household was the relevant variable for both parties. The yearly sum of £11 10s 0d represents the use-value Gurling placed on the forty-five acres, calculated against the prospect of Mary Hoskison's expected remaining lifetime. At that annual rate, Gurling would recover the capital equivalent of a £170 0s 0d outlay within roughly fifteen years, which suggests both parties were working from a rough estimate of Mary's remaining lifespan in that range. The figure provides a useful benchmark for the value of unimproved upland on the island at that date. Thomas Goodwin, Edward Walkborne and William Marsden appear as witnesses to both deeds, just as they had witnessed the Dweight transactions of 8 June 1708. The recurrence of the same three council members across four deeds within a single month confirms that the governor, deputy governor and third in council had taken on a settled role as the standing witnesses for substantial conveyances. The pattern formalises the council's institutional presence in private property dealings beyond its more familiar role in Company grants and exchanges. Speculations The combination of the Bevia sale and the Hoskison mortgage within a fortnight of each other suggests Hoskison was reorganising his estate in a deliberate sequence. He bought the south part of the Box twenty acres on 22 June 1708 for £15 0s 0d, and |

The two transactions look like parts of a single plan: consolidating the Box parcels under his name and then extracting an income stream from the consolidated holding without selling it outright. The inclusion of Bevia's future interest in his wife's family estate within the consideration may explain the modest cash price of £15 0s 0d for the south part of the twenty acres. The bare parcel of perhaps ten acres would ordinarily have commanded a higher figure based on comparable Lemon Valley prices, and the low cash component suggests Hoskison was paying primarily for the contingent interest rather than for the land itself. The structure points to Hoskison anticipating that one or more of his wife's siblings was unlikely to survive, and that the reversion would carry the real value of the bargain. The mortgage to Gurling on Mary Hoskison's life rather than on George's own suggests Mary was younger than George and expected to outlive him. By tying the term to her life, Hoskison created an income stream that would continue after his own death and pass with his estate, with the annuity falling on Gurling for the duration of Mary's remaining years. The arrangement looks like provision for the household's continuing income after George's death, with Gurling cast in the role of paying tenant and Mary as the measuring life on whose survival both the annuity and Gurling's possession depended. Richard Gurling's willingness to take on a £11 10s 0d annual commitment for an uncertain term suggests he had the capital and the appetite for a long-term agricultural investment. The earlier Gurling transactions in the records show two different Richard Gurlings: the elder, who appears as deceased in the Sherwin-Goodwin deed of 1694, and the younger, who sold the Chapel Valley plot to George Carne in 1704 and the £500 composite estate to Hoskison in October 1706. The mortgage to Gurling here is probably the same younger Richard Gurling, returning to a transaction with Hoskison nearly two years after the £500 sale and now taking land back from him under the reverse direction of payment. |

The will gave them power to dispose of any part of Dufton's real estate for the good and benefit of his children, after the debts and legacies were paid. Acting under that power, the executors agreed that Jonathan Doveton and his heirs should have and peaceably enjoy ten acres taken from the deceased Dufton's twenty acres of land. The particular ten acres were to be agreed between the parties in line with the verdict of a jury directed for the purpose, dated 24 March 1708. Doveton paid £20 0s 0d, which the executors acknowledged as received for the use of Dufton's children. The deed was made on 3 August 1708 and witnessed by Thomas Goodwin, Edward Walkborne and William Marsden. Daniel Griffeth and Jonathan Doveton signed. A separate memorandum recorded a parallel agreement made on the same day. The executors agreed with John George Newman that he should have and enjoy for ever a house, with the ground belonging to it on which he had recently built. The house had formerly been in the possession and occupation of the deceased William Dufton. The arrangement was made in consideration of Newman's marriage to Mary, the daughter of the deceased.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

He discharged the executors from any further claim arising from the estate. The deed was witnessed by the same three council members. Daniel Griffeth and Jonathan Doveton signed. Newman signed by his mark in the form of I I G N M. Interpretations The Dufton executors' authority rests on the testamentary power to dispose of any part of the real estate for the good and benefit of the children, after debts and legacies were paid. The clause shows William Dufton planning his succession before his death, using the will to convert the inflexible rules of inheritance into a discretionary fund managed by his named executors. The mechanism let the household respond to circumstances unknown at the time the will was drawn, including the marriage of his daughter Mary, the practical needs of his children and the availability of a buyer for half the rural land. The jury verdict of 24 March 1708 is the operative procedural device behind the Doveton transaction. The executors did not unilaterally settle the boundary between the ten acres sold and the ten retained, but instead obtained a jury direction on how the division was to run. The use of a jury to fix a land boundary echoes the procedure of the 1682 inquest of allotments and shows the device surviving as a working part of island practice. The jury's role here is to translate an abstract testamentary direction into a defined parcel on the ground, with the parties bound by the verdict in the same way that a modern survey would bind them. The sale of ten acres to Doveton for £20 0s 0d places the cash value of upland Chapel Valley land at £2 0s 0d per acre, comparable to other Dufton-related dealings. The earlier 5 May 1703 sale by William Marsh on his son Robert's behalf had moved twenty acres to William Dufton near the head of Chapel Valley, and the 9 August 1705 confirmation deed from Robert Marsh on reaching his majority had set the confirmation price at £20 0s 0d for those twenty acres. The current sale of half that holding to Doveton at the same total figure shows that the cash value of the land had effectively doubled between 1703 and 1708, which reflects either appreciation in the open market or the difference between confirmation and sale prices. The Newman transaction operates as a marriage portion under a discretionary will. Newman is given the house and the ground he had recently built on, formerly Dufton's possession, in right of his marriage to Mary Dufton. The arrangement substitutes a particular asset for any further share of the estate, with Newman expressly acknowledging that the house and ground are his full portion and discharging the executors from further demand. The mechanism therefore settles the daughter's interest in her father's estate by a single defined transfer rather than by a continuing right to share in the residue. The fact that Newman had recently built on the ground himself, before any formal transfer of title, points to an arrangement that began as informal occupation and was being regularised at the executors' hands. Newman had taken possession with the family's tacit consent and constructed his dwelling there in anticipation of the marriage. The executors' deed of 3 August 1708 converts that informal occupation into a settled freehold in his name, with Mary's interest in the estate extinguished as the consideration for the conveyance. Daniel Griffeth's appearance as executor under Dufton's will marks a fresh role for him in the records. He had served as clerk of the council from at least 1691, certifying many true copies and acting as a witness to numerous transactions. The role of executor here brings |

The combination of his administrative office and his private trust shows the small literate circle on the island extending its institutional functions into the personal affairs of the planter households. Jonathan Dufton's role as the other executor places a member of the family in the management of the estate alongside Griffeth. The combination of an outside executor and a family member is a standard early-modern arrangement, designed to balance independent administration against the family's continuing interest in the disposition of the assets. Jonathan would have known the practical details of the holding, while Griffeth's clerical experience supplied the procedural knowledge needed to execute the will properly. Speculations The use of a jury verdict to fix the boundary between the ten acres sold to Doveton and the ten retained by the estate suggests the executors anticipated potential disagreement over which half of the land would pass. A simple bisection on the map might have favoured one party or the other depending on access to water, slope, exposure or the position of any improvements. By taking the matter to a jury, the executors removed themselves from any later allegation of favouritism between the children of the estate and the buyer, and produced a binding determination that no party could subsequently contest. The decision to settle Mary Dufton's share through her husband's pre-existing house rather than through a money portion suggests the household had limited liquidity after the £20 0s 0d sale to Doveton. Newman had already built on Dufton land before the formal arrangement, and the executors' acknowledgement of his prior construction looks like the recognition of a practical fait accompli. The arrangement let the executors satisfy Mary's share without raising further cash from the remaining ten acres, and conserved the estate's funds for the other children's portions. The same-day execution of both deeds on 3 August 1708 indicates a coordinated settlement of two parts of the Dufton estate. The executors had probably been working towards this date for some months, with the jury direction obtained on 24 March 1708 establishing the boundary line, and the marriage and the buyer's offer concluding the necessary preparatory work. The choice to bring both transactions before the same panel of council witnesses on the same day reflects the practice of clearing related estate business at a single sitting. The omission of any explicit reference to William Dufton's other children, beyond the daughter Mary whose interest is satisfied by the Newman conveyance, leaves open how the remaining ten acres and the £20 0s 0d cash from Doveton were to be applied. The executors' discharge from any further demand by Newman binds him and Mary, but does not extend to her siblings, whose claims on the estate continued to be managed by Griffeth and Jonathan Dufton. The arrangement therefore deals only with one branch of the inheritance, and the residue of the estate remained subject to the testator's general direction for the good and benefit of his children. |

The father covenanted that he would not himself, nor any of his heirs, executors or assigns, nor any other person acting through him, disturb or evict the son or his successors from the land. The deed was made on 5 August 1695, in the seventh year of the reign of King William. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of J Sneill and John Vernon, after the words of George Hoskeson had been inserted in the margin. Orlando Bagley senior set his hand and seal to it. Interpretations The Bagley senior to junior gift of 5 August 1695 introduces a new family line into the records of the head of Chapel Valley. The Orlando Bagley name does not appear in the 1682 inquest of allotments, and the parcel is identified as the late Thomas Sherwin's lot rather than as land originally allotted to a Bagley. The transfer therefore shows the Bagley household acquiring a Sherwin parcel before this date and now passing it directly to the next generation, with the route of acquisition from Sherwin to Bagley unrecorded in the documents reviewed so far. The Thomas Sherwin identified here as the late planter of the island is the same man whose wife Prudence Sherwin sold the Chapel Valley tenement to Thomas Goodwin on 2 July 1694, acting under his letter of attorney. The 1694 deed described him as absent rather than deceased, and the 1695 deed describes him as late. The interval of just over a year between the two records places Sherwin's death somewhere between July 1694 and August 1695, most probably while he was still absent from the island. The transition from absent husband to deceased planter therefore marks a particular point in the closing of the Sherwin estate, with the Chapel Valley tenement having gone to Goodwin and a ten-acre upland lot having reached the Bagleys before this point. The boundary description identifies George Hoskison as the southern neighbour, John Bowman as the eastern neighbour, the elder Bagley's own land formerly Joseph Smith's as the western neighbour, and Edward Edmunds as the northern neighbour. The presence of Hoskison, Bowman and Edmunds in 1695 confirms that all three were established holders at the head of Chapel Valley a decade before the more extensive Hoskison transactions of the mid-1700s. The Joseph Smith name marks a further Sherwin-era allotment now in the elder Bagley's hands, and shows that he had built up at least two upland parcels at the head of the valley. The margin note recording the insertion of the words of George Hoskison is documented at the foot of the deed itself. The boundary description had originally been drafted without naming Hoskison as the southern neighbour, and the addition was made before sealing. The witnesses J Sneill and John Vernon attested the deed after the correction was made, which gave the inserted words the same legal force as the rest of the text. The mechanism shows how boundary descriptions could be amended at the moment of execution to reflect the actual position of the neighbouring holders, with the marginal insertion serving as the formal record of the correction. The gift was made without any consideration of money. The deed expressly states that the son was to enjoy the property freely without paying any money to his father or to any other person on his father's behalf. |

The structure preserves the parent's continuing authority over his other estate while passing one defined parcel directly to the named child during the parent's lifetime. Orlando Bagley senior is distinct from the John Bagley who appears in the 1682 inquest and from the Edward Bagley who emerges in the 1705 to 1708 records as a major figure at the head of Lemon Valley. The name Orlando is uncommon among the planter households recorded so far, and the appearance of two generations of Orlando Bagleys at the head of Chapel Valley in 1695 confirms a separate Bagley line operating in that part of the island. The relationship of the Orlando Bagleys to the Edward Bagley and the John Bagley of the Lemon Valley records is not clarified by this deed, though the shared surname suggests a wider family network. Speculations The decision to make the conveyance as a pure gift, with the express exclusion of any payment, suggests Orlando Bagley senior was making a settlement on his son in advance of his own death rather than waiting to pass the property by will. The mechanism let the son take possession during the father's lifetime and protected the parcel from any claim by other creditors or heirs that might emerge later. The choice of an immediate inter vivos transfer over a testamentary disposition is therefore probably a deliberate response to circumstances within the family or within the elder Bagley's broader estate. The specification that no payment was to be made even by any other person on the father's behalf points to an awareness of the risk that someone might later attempt to assert a financial claim against the gift. By closing off any possibility of consideration, the elder Bagley placed the transfer on the foundation of natural love and affection alone, which protected the son's title against the kind of latent claim that the quit-claims of 1704 and 1707 were drawn to extinguish. The clause makes the gift unimpeachable as a sale, since no sale was ever made. The marginal insertion of George Hoskison's name as the southern neighbour, made at the moment of execution and attested by the witnesses, suggests that the original draft was prepared before the parties had finally settled on the description of the southern boundary. Hoskison's identity as the relevant neighbour may have been confirmed only at the meeting at which the deed was sealed, perhaps because he had only recently established his own holding at the head of the valley. The correction therefore preserves a small moment of practical drafting in which the document was brought into line with the position on the ground at the very point of completion. |

Jasper Jaye signed by his mark in the form of J. Interpretations The Bagley junior to Edmunds sale brings the gift made by Orlando Bagley senior to Orlando Bagley junior on 5 August 1695 onto the open market within five months of its execution. The gift had been made expressly without any consideration of money, with the elder Bagley closing off all possibility of a sale being argued against the son's title. The son's response, in disposing of the parcel for £12 0s 0d to the neighbouring holder, shows the practical effect of the gift's drafting: it gave the son a clean and unencumbered title that he could realise immediately for cash. The boundary description in the January 1695 deed reverses the orientation given in the August 1695 gift. The earlier gift had described the same parcel with George Hoskison to the south, Edward Edmunds to the north, John Bowman to the east and the elder Bagley's land to the west. The current deed places Edmunds to the south, Hoskison to the north, the elder Bagley to the east and Bowman to the west. The compass references are essentially rotated, and either the original gift or this sale contained an error in the orientation of the boundary. Without a survey on the ground, the discrepancy can be noted but not resolved on the documents alone. The price of £12 0s 0d for ten acres at the head of Chapel Valley provides a useful comparative figure. The Dixon to Casthope sale of 6 January 1700 had moved ten acres at the head of Lemon Valley at £15 0s 0d, and the Casthope to Goodwin onward sale of 9 February 1702 had moved the same parcel at £10 0s 0d. The Chapel Valley figure here in 1695 falls within the same general range, suggesting that the local market for upland ten-acre parcels at the head of the major valleys stood at roughly £10 0s 0d to £15 0s 0d through the late 1690s and early 1700s, with variations reflecting improvements, access and the particular circumstances of the transaction. The Jaye to Edmunds sale of 13 February 1683 is the earliest individual conveyance in this set, made within five months of the 26 September 1682 inquest of allotments. The sale shows the planter community moving from initial allotment into active resale within a single agricultural season, with Jaye disposing of his ten acres while continuing to live on them under the reserved supplies of yams and the right to keep poultry. The pattern reflects how quickly the formal allotment system gave way to a working secondary market in land among the free planters. |

|                    |                 |                   | The structured price of £8 0s 0d in money and £8 0s 0d in goods is the operative feature of the Jaye sale. Cash was scarce on the island in the early 1680s, and a buyer offering half the price in trade goods, perhaps cloth, tools, salt, sugar or other Company-issued stores, would have found the deal more attractive than a buyer demanding the whole sum in coin. The arrangement also gave Jaye a useful stock of goods alongside his cash, which he could employ either in continued residence or in preparations for departure from the island. The reservation of yams sufficient to maintain Jaye and his wife in need, provided they had not departed from the island, gives the deed the character of a life maintenance contract as much as a sale. Jaye was effectively converting his ownership of the land into a continuing right to draw food from it, with the underlying title passing to Edmunds but the practical sustenance of the household remaining unaffected. The structure reflects the realities of an island where the alternative to remaining on the land was a passage off the island, and where the means of subsistence had to be guaranteed before any sale could be agreed. The right to keep five dozen fowls at the door extends the maintenance arrangement to a second food source. Sixty fowls represent a working flock for an island household, providing eggs, meat and the occasional surplus for sale. The reservation is unusual in being specified at a precise numerical level, with the figure of five dozen marking the boundary between subsistence and surplus. The provision shows how concretely the parties calculated the practical needs of a continuing household within the terms of a land sale. Francis Wrangham appears in the January 1695 deed as the former holder of the southern boundary, with the land now in Edmunds's possession. The 1682 inquest recorded Wrangham as an original holder at the head of Chapel Valley, and his death and the remarriage of his widow to Henry Francis are referenced in the records of the Henry Francis quit-claim of 27 January 1704. The land referred to here is therefore probably one of the parcels that passed out of the Wrangham household after his death, with Edmunds acquiring it before the 1695 sale by Bagley junior. Richard Gurling, George Hoskison and Henry Francis appear together as the witnesses to the January 1695 deed. The presence of Hoskison as a witness, just months before the marginal insertion of his name as southern neighbour in the August 1695 gift from Orlando Bagley senior, points to his active and recognised position at the head of Chapel Valley by early 1695. Henry Francis, married to Wrangham's widow, would have had an interest in the southern boundary description through his wife's connection to the former Wrangham parcel, and his witnessing of the deed brings the Francis household into the transaction as an informal observer. Speculations The five-month interval between the gift from father to son in August 1695 and the sale from son to Edmunds in January 1695 is impossible as stated, since January 1695 would precede August 1695. The dating convention of the time, in which the year began on 25 March rather than 1 January, resolves the apparent contradiction. The deed dated 9 January 169 4/5 falls in modern reckoning in January 1695, but the August 1695 gift would have been the seventh year of King William. The January 1695 sale is therefore actually January 1696 in modern reckoning, which restores the chronological order: gift in August 1695, sale in January 1696. The five-month interval reflects the son moving quickly to realise the value of the gift in cash, perhaps in preparation for his own departure from the island or for some other immediate financial purpose. |

The elder Bagley would have known that gifting the land freed his son to sell it without paternal interference, and the choice of Edmunds as buyer points to a pre-arranged disposal in which the neighbouring holder absorbed the parcel into his own working estate. The structure looks like a coordinated movement of value from father to son to neighbour, with the cash proceeds reaching the son and the land settling with Edmunds. The Jaye reservation of yams and poultry, combined with the proviso that the supplies would continue only so long as Jaye and his wife had not departed from the island, suggests Jaye was contemplating a future departure but was not yet committed to going. The arrangement gave him the option of staying on under the maintenance regime or leaving with the cash and goods, with no need to settle the question at the moment of sale. The flexibility built into the deed reflects the uncertain position of garrison-era planters, whose continued presence on the island depended on Company employment, family circumstances and the availability of passage on outbound shipping.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

The land adjoined the holdings of Mr Carne, Walter Morres and Edward Bagley. The price was a composite of cash and livestock, paid as follows: Cash in Spanish dollars 100 dollars, paid in hand Cattle 2 cows and 2 calves, to be delivered on demand Belvard and his heirs took the message, plantation and premises with all the provisions on the ground and all things belonging to it. The conveyance was subject to a condition that the Bradleys would continue in possession for two years from the date of the deed, or sooner if Arthur departed the island, at which point Belvard would enter into quiet possession. The deed was made on 18 October 1705 and sealed and delivered in the presence of John Nicholls, William C Owen and Daniel Griffeth. Arthur Bradley and Sarah Bradley each set their hand and seal to it. A separate memorandum recorded an exchange of slaves between Hugh Bodley, free planter of the island, and Jonathan Doveton, also a free planter. Bodley transferred to Doveton his right and title to a male slave youth. In return Doveton transferred to Bodley a female slave known as Sue, who had formerly belonged to the estate of the late Leonard Coulson, free planter. Doveton bound himself and his heirs to save Bodley and his heirs harmless from any claim arising from the exchange. The deed was made on 13 August 1708 and witnessed by Thomas Goodwin and William Marsden, third in council. Hugh Bodley and Jonathan Doveton each signed. Interpretations The Bradley to Belvard sale combines an immediate cash payment with a deferred delivery of livestock and a two-year reservation of possession. The 100 Spanish dollars paid in hand gave Belvard a clear receipt and gave the Bradleys their immediate cash. The two cows and two calves remaining to be delivered on demand functioned as a continuing obligation hanging over Belvard until the Bradleys called for them, which kept Belvard tied to the transaction for as long as the cattle remained undelivered. They sold the freehold but retained the right to occupy and work the land for two years from the date of the deed, or until Arthur departed the island if that came sooner. The arrangement converts the sale into something close to a sale subject to a fixed lease back, with the Bradleys remaining as the working occupiers of land they no longer owned. The proviso linking the term to Arthur's departure is the controlling element: if his Company service called him off the island within the two years, the sale would crystallise earlier than the fixed term. Sarah Bradley's appearance as a co-signatory of the deed, alongside her husband Arthur, brings a married woman directly into the conveyance rather than as the holder of a separate dower or jointure right. The pattern matches the joint conveyance by William French and his wife Mary to Edward Bagley of 4 March 1708, where both spouses signed and sealed. The mechanism shows that married women on the island could be parties to a freehold sale in their own right, and not only through the device of a letter of attorney from an absent husband as in the Rhodes, Sherwin and Carne arrangements. Walter Belvard appears here on 18 October 1705 as a buyer of ten acres adjoining Carne, Morres and Bagley land. His later appearance on 8 June 1708 as the buyer of George Dweight's ten-acre Sharks Valley parcel and six-acre Company leasehold for £170 0s 0d shows him moving from this initial Chapel Valley purchase to a substantial Sharks Valley estate in less than three years. The pattern indicates Belvard building his holdings across multiple parts of the island during the latter part of the decade. The Bodley to Doveton exchange of 13 August 1708 records the transfer of two slaves by direct barter rather than by sale. No cash consideration appears in the deed, and the operative consideration on each side is the slave delivered by the other. The structure shows slaves being treated as fully fungible property within the planter community, exchangeable for one another in the same way that cattle, hogs or other livestock were exchanged. The deed preserves the name Sue for the female slave but does not record the name of the male youth, which is unusual within the practice of recording slave identifications in conveyancing. Sue's prior history is given in the deed: she had formerly belonged to the estate of the late Leonard Coulson, free planter. The Coulson name connects to Mrs Grace Coulson, who appears in the 10 May 1700 Edmunds to Goodwin Chapel Valley tenement deed as one of the boundary holders. The Leonard Coulson identified here is probably the late husband of Grace Coulson, and Sue's passage from the Coulson estate through Doveton to Bodley records the movement of a single slave across at least three planter households after Leonard's death. The Bodley to Doveton deed is witnessed by Thomas Goodwin and William Marsden, third in council, without the deputy governor Edward Walkborne. The change from the standard three-man witness panel that had appeared on the Dweight transactions of 8 June 1708, the Bevan to Hoskison and Hoskison to Gurling deeds of June and July 1708, and the Dufton executors' deeds of 3 August 1708, indicates that Walkborne was not present on 13 August. The reduced witness list shows that the council's role in attesting private deeds, while institutional, was not strictly fixed at three men, and that two members of the governing body could attest a transfer where the deputy governor was unavailable. |

The pattern shows Doveton actively expanding his estate and his slave holdings within a short period, with the land acquisition of 3 August accompanied or followed by adjustments to his labour force. The 13 August exchange may have been made to give him the male youth he needed to work the newly acquired ten acres of Dufton land at the head of Chapel Valley. Speculations The decision to take 100 Spanish dollars in hand and two cows and two calves on demand suggests the Bradleys were calibrating the deal to their immediate and longer-term needs. The cash secured their position for the present, while the deferred cattle would provide them with breeding stock either for use during their two-year occupation or for taking off the island if they departed. The choice to leave the livestock to be delivered on demand rather than at a fixed date kept Belvard responsible for the maintenance of the animals until the Bradleys called for them, which suited a household uncertain whether it would remain on the island long enough to need the cattle on its own ground. The structure of the Bradley deed, in which the seller retained possession for up to two years, points to Arthur Bradley as a soldier subject to the possibility of recall or redeployment by the Company. By writing the two-year cap and the early termination on departure into the deed, the parties acknowledged that Arthur's Company service controlled the timing of his physical removal from the land. The arrangement let the Bradleys plan around either continued residence or a sudden recall, with the sale already in place and only the date of Belvard's entry remaining contingent. The exchange of a male slave youth for the female slave Sue, rather than a straightforward sale of either, suggests that Bodley and Doveton each had a specific labour need that the other could meet. Bodley may have wanted a female slave for domestic, agricultural or perhaps reproductive purposes, while Doveton may have wanted a male youth for the heavier work of the ten acres he had acquired ten days earlier from the Dufton estate. The exchange therefore looks like a matching of labour profiles between two households rather than a sale prompted by financial necessity, with each principal getting the slave more suited to his current operations. The absence of any cash component or balancing payment in the slave exchange implies that the two slaves were treated as roughly equivalent in value at the time of the deed. The mechanism for valuing slaves in island deeds otherwise involved either an explicit price or the kind of cattle appraisal by two impartial persons used for livestock. The decision to forgo any valuation and to treat the two slaves as simply exchangeable suggests an established understanding within the planter community of what a male youth and a young adult female were each worth, with no need to document the calculation. |

Walter Belvard and Richard Gurling each signed. A separate indenture was made on 20 July 1708 between John Bagley, free planter of St Helena, and Lieutenant Edward Walkborne, deputy governor of the island. Bagley received £30 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand at the sealing of the deed. He acknowledged its receipt and discharged Walkborne and his heirs from any further claim. Other good causes and considerations were also recited as moving him to enter into the conveyance. In return Bagley demised, granted, bargained and farm-let to Walkborne, his executors, administrators and assigns ten acres of land called Smiths Plain. The parcel adjoined the lands of Gabriel Powell and Bagley's own remaining land. Interpretations The Belvard to Gurling sale completes the third stage of a chain that began with the Bradleys' sale to Belvard on 18 October 1705. The Bradleys received 100 Spanish dollars and two cows with two calves for ten acres adjoining Carne, Morres and Bagley land. Belvard now realises £70 0s 0d sterling from the same parcel by selling on to Richard Gurling, which represents a substantial appreciation over what he had paid less than three years earlier. The location is here identified as Fryer Valley, which clarifies the position of the original Bradley plantation in the boundary description of 1705. The same-day involvement of Thomas Goodwin, Edward Walkborne and William Marsden as witnesses to the Belvard-Gurling deed of 17 August 1708 returns the standard three-man council panel to the witnessing role that had been interrupted on 13 August. The pattern shows that the council's attendance at significant private conveyances had been resumed in full, and that the absence of Walkborne from the Bodley-Doveton slave exchange of four days earlier had been a particular circumstance rather than a change in practice. The Bagley to Walkborne deed of 20 July 1708 is technically described in the heading as a deed of mortgage, but the body of the indenture uses the language of demise, grant, bargain and farm-letting that ordinarily denotes a lease for a term of years. The combination of headings and operative wording suggests the parties intended an instrument that functioned commercially as a mortgage but was framed in the form of a lease, which was a standard early-modern device for securing a debt against land while keeping the underlying freehold in the borrower's name. The cash sum of £30 0s 0d advanced by Walkborne to Bagley fixes the secured loan at that figure. The land called Smiths Plain served as the security for the advance, with Walkborne taking possession of the ten acres until the loan was repaid. The structure inverts the relationship that the Hoskison to Gurling mortgage of 6 July 1708 had documented, where Gurling paid an annuity to Hoskison during Mary Hoskison's life. Here Bagley received the principal in a single payment and pledged the ten acres until the debt was settled. The reference to divers other good causes and considerations moving John Bagley to enter into the conveyance preserves the standard formula for keeping an additional element of the arrangement out of the written record. The £30 0s 0d in cash is the recited consideration, but the language of further causes suggests there may have been a side agreement on interest, on the term of redemption or on related obligations between Bagley and Walkborne that the parties chose not to commit to writing. Edward Walkborne's appearance in this deed in his private capacity, as a lender taking land as security, sits alongside his official role as deputy governor of the |

The combination of public office and private financial dealings was characteristic of the small body of council members who served as the principal witnesses, principal officeholders and principal lenders within the planter community. Walkborne's transition from witness in earlier deeds to principal here shows him moving between institutional and personal roles within the same set of records. Smiths Plain identifies the ten acres by a place name rather than by the name of a previous holder. The pattern parallels the Lemon Garden, the Purslane Bed, the Great Wood Ridge and other named features in the records, and shows that place names attached to particular pieces of ground were used alongside the more common method of identification by reference to an allottee. The Smith name in the place identification probably refers back to the Joseph Smith land mentioned in the August 1695 gift from Orlando Bagley senior to his son, where the elder Bagley's land was described as formerly Joseph Smith's. Gabriel Powell appears here as the neighbouring holder to Smiths Plain. The Powell name had moved through the 11 May 1704 same-day purchases and sales at Peak Gult, the 7 September 1706 acquisition of fifty acres in Chapel Valley from George Hoskison for £350 0s 0d, and his witness role to several earlier conveyances. The presence of Powell as the named neighbour to Bagley's mortgaged land confirms that he held substantial ground in the same part of the island, and locates Smiths Plain within the broader Powell holdings. John Bagley distinguishes the parties to this deed from the line of Edward Bagley who features in the larger Lemon Valley transactions, from the Orlando Bagley senior and junior of the Chapel Valley records, and from the John and Margaret Bagley couple who sold to Edward Bagley on 10 August 1705. The proliferation of Bagley households in the records by 1708 confirms that the family had become one of the more numerous planter lines on the island, with property dealings spread across multiple valleys and multiple branches of the kinship network. Speculations The appreciation of the Bradley parcel from 100 Spanish dollars plus two cows and two calves in 1705 to £70 0s 0d in 1708 suggests Belvard had either improved the land during his period of ownership or benefited from a general rise in Fryer Valley land prices. The 1705 deed had given the Bradleys a two-year reservation of possession, which means Belvard would have entered into actual occupation only around October 1707. The interval between his entry and his onward sale was therefore less than a year, which makes substantial physical improvement unlikely. The appreciation is more probably explained by an upward movement in the market for upland Fryer Valley parcels in the period when Belvard chose to sell. Belvard's pattern of acquisition and disposal across 1705 to 1708 suggests an active trader rather than a settled planter. He bought the Bradley parcel in October 1705 with a two-year possessory delay, took Dweight's Sharks Valley holding with a Company leasehold in June 1708 for £170 0s 0d, and sold the Fryer Valley parcel onward to Gurling in August 1708 for £70 0s 0d. The structure of his dealings, taking on extensive holdings while disposing of others, points to a planter using land transactions as a continuing commercial activity rather than as occasional adjustments to a fixed estate. John Bagley's recourse to a mortgage with the deputy governor rather than with a fellow planter suggests either that Walkborne offered a particular advantage on the terms, or that Bagley had limited alternative sources of credit on the island. The deputy governor's official position gave him both the means to |

The choice of Walkborne also brought a higher level of formality and council attestation to the transaction, which protected both parties against later challenge.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

The rent was 40s 0d, payable to Walkborne in addition to the £30 0s 0d already advanced. The deed bound John Bagley, his wife Margaret and their heirs as well as Bagley alone. Walkborne, his heirs and assigns were to hold and enjoy the land peacefully, provided the redemption sum of £32 0s 0d was not paid at the agreed time. John Bagley and Margaret his wife set their hands and seals to the deed on the day and year first written. It was sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of Robert Goodwin and William Jesper. John Bagley signed. A separate bill of sale was made by John Lufkin, free planter of the island, to the Right Honourable United Company of Merchants of London Trading to the East Indies. The Company acted through Stephen Poirier, esquire, governor, and the council of the island. Lufkin received £350 0s 0d in good and lawful money of England, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the bill. He acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full receipt. Lufkin gave, granted, bargained and sold to the Company, their heirs and successors Interpretations The completion of the Bagley to Walkborne mortgage exposes the financial structure of the transaction. Walkborne advanced £30 0s 0d, and the redemption sum was £32 0s 0d, payable within six months. The £2 0s 0d difference represents the cost of borrowing the principal for the period, which at six months on £30 0s 0d works out at an annual rate of about 13 per cent. The figure sits well above the legal English maximum of six per cent under the Usury Acts then in force, and shows how the rate of return on credit secured against island land was set by local conditions rather than by metropolitan law. The expression of the loan in the form of a six-month farm-letting at 40s 0d rent, with the £30 0s 0d treated as a separate sum advanced by Walkborne to Bagley, is the standard early-modern device for evading the formal language of usury. The lender takes the land into possession as a lessee, with the rent paid by the borrower being the interest in another form. The transaction is therefore not a mortgage in the strict English sense, in which the borrower retains possession and the lender holds only a charge, but an inversion in which the lender enters and the borrower pays for the use of his own land in addition to repaying the principal. The inclusion of Margaret Bagley as a co-party to the deed brings the joint marital dimension into the mortgage. Without her signature, any reversionary interest she might claim as widow to the land would have remained outside the security. The joinder of the wife, paralleling the joint conveyance of William and Mary French to Edward Bagley of 4 March 1708 and the Bradley sale of 18 October 1705, shows the planter community recognising the need to bind both spouses where the security of a debt depended on the land staying free of competing family claims. The penalty provision, by which Walkborne would hold the land if the £32 0s 0d was not paid at the agreed time, constitutes the effective forfeiture clause. The structure operates as a strict foreclosure rather than as the modern equity of redemption: if Bagley failed to pay on the due date, Walkborne's possession became permanent. The mechanism is harsh by later standards |

The Company is identified by its full corporate style, the consideration is in sterling rather than in island currency, and the receipt is given in the language of an English commercial bill of sale. The structure shows the Company moving between its roles as land bank, as overlord and as direct purchaser when its institutional interests required the acquisition of a particular asset. The price of £350 0s 0d in good and lawful money of England is comparable to the £350 0s 0d that George Hoskison had paid Gabriel Powell for the dwelling house and fifty acres in Chapel Valley on 7 September 1706. The Lufkin transaction therefore stands at the upper end of recorded island prices, and points to a substantial asset of some kind rather than a routine parcel of upland. The Company's willingness to commit £350 0s 0d in sterling, drawn against its central account rather than against island stores, marks the transaction as one of strategic importance to the institution. Stephen Poirier appears here as governor signing on behalf of the Company. His earlier appearances in the records include witnessing the Swallow to Sech conveyance of 4 February 1705 and the Heath to Charles deed of 13 March 1705, and approving the Company's 99-year extension grant to Paul Charles on the same date. The current bill of sale shows him still in office at the time of the Lufkin transaction, with Thomas Goodwin and Edward Walkborne having succeeded him in the witnessing roles of June, July and August 1708. The chronology indicates that the Lufkin sale falls earlier than the August 1708 council session, since by that date Goodwin had become governor. Speculations The choice of a six-month term for the Bagley to Walkborne mortgage suggests an expectation of imminent income from a particular source. Bagley would have needed to find £32 0s 0d in cash within six months of 20 July 1708, which placed the redemption date around 20 January 1709. The timing falls just after the end of the autumn harvest cycle and before the next year's planting, when a successful crop could have produced both the cash and the surplus needed to meet the obligation. The short term therefore points to Bagley borrowing against a specific anticipated payment rather than against the general value of the land. The Lufkin sale to the Company in the visible portion of the bill, with the £350 0s 0d paid in sterling drawn against the Company's central account, suggests the asset was something the Company specifically needed for its operations. A free planter's ordinary rural parcel would not normally command £350 0s 0d in sterling from the Company, and the figure is more consistent with the acquisition of a tenement, a strategically located piece of ground, or an asset with particular institutional value. The structure of the deed, with the governor and council acting directly on behalf of the Company, indicates a transaction taken at the institutional level rather than at the level of routine plantation business. Margaret Bagley's joinder in the mortgage deed reflects a deliberate decision to secure the lender's position against any future claim she might bring as widow. The standard form of widow's dower or comparable marital interest could have given her a continuing claim on the land if Bagley died before redemption. By bringing her into the deed as a sealing party, Walkborne extinguished that risk in advance, and the structure points to the deputy governor having sufficient knowledge of the local practice of marital |

The sale included the beams, hedges, woods, fences, walls, watercourses and all other appurtenances belonging to the property. The parcel lay next to the Company's main pastureland. The Company, its heirs and successors took the premises for ever, to their own proper use and behoof. Lufkin and his heirs covenanted with the Company that it would hold, occupy and enjoy the house, land, provisions and all other appurtenances without disturbance. He bound himself, his heirs, executors and administrators to save the Company harmless from any unlawful claim or demand and from all encumbrances of any kind, whether arising by his own act, consent or procurement or by any other means. The deed was made on 26 June 1707 and sealed and delivered in the presence of Matthew Bazett and John Alexander. John Lufkin set his hand and seal to it. Interpretations The Lufkin bill of sale shows the Company acting as a direct purchaser of a substantial settled estate from a free planter, rather than as the issuer of grants or the recipient of land surrendered under exchange arrangements. The £350 0s 0d in sterling was paid out of the Company's central funds, and the structure of the deed is identical to a private bill of sale between two free planters. The mechanism reveals the Company as a buyer in the open market when its strategic interests required the acquisition of a particular property, with the planter's title transferred by the standard conveyancing form rather than by any special institutional process. The location of the property next to the Company's main pastureland is the operative feature explaining the institutional interest in the purchase. The Company's main pasture would have supplied the working livestock for its own operations on the island, including draft animals, riding horses and cattle for slaughter to provision passing ships. Acquiring an adjoining thirty-acre parcel with a dwelling house, growing provisions and a full set of agricultural improvements gave the Company the opportunity to enlarge its pastureland directly, to bring an existing planter holding under its own management, or to remove a neighbouring private estate from a position where it might constrain Company operations. The deed's full enumeration of beams, hedges, woods, fences, walls and watercourses gives the standard catalogue of an improved upland holding. The presence of all these elements indicates a substantial working plantation rather than an undeveloped parcel, and the £350 0s 0d price reflects the value of the improvements as much as the underlying land. The figure stands at the upper end of recorded island prices for thirty-acre holdings and comfortably above the Hoskison purchase of dwelling house and fifty acres from Gabriel Powell on 7 September 1706 at the same sterling figure. The witnessing of the bill of sale by Matthew Bazett and John Alexander, without any council members beyond Stephen Poirier himself as the governor named in the recital, distinguishes this deed from the private conveyances of the later 1708 records, where the standard three-man council panel attended. The Company's acquisition was sealed under its own institutional authority rather than as a transaction needing the witness of the council in its private-witness capacity, and the choice of Bazett and Alexander reflects the use of the experienced register and a trusted senior planter for the attestation. |

Stephen Poirier was still in office as governor at this date, and Thomas Goodwin had been described as deputy governor and storekeeper in the 3 June 1703 sale by William French, with his elevation to esquire by 22 September 1705 in the Bevean settlement and to governor by 16 December 1707 in the sale of the William French parcel to Hoskison. The chronology therefore places the Lufkin sale during Poirier's continuing governorship and before Goodwin's promotion. The save harmless covenant given by Lufkin to the Company is more comprehensively drafted than the comparable warranties in many of the planter-to-planter deeds. It covers unlawful claims, demands and encumbrances of any kind, whether arising by Lufkin's own act, consent or procurement or by any other means. The breadth of the covenant indicates the Company's institutional concern to protect itself against latent claims to a property it intended to bring under its own management, and reflects the practice of corporate lawyers in framing covenants that closed off every conceivable route to a third-party challenge. Speculations The Company's willingness to commit £350 0s 0d in sterling for the Lufkin property, drawn from its central account rather than from the local stores, points to a strategic acquisition that the governor and council judged worth the outlay. The adjacent main pastureland would have generated a continuing operational benefit from any extension, and the consolidation of an additional thirty acres into the Company's own holdings would have given it more flexibility in managing livestock, work animals and provisioning. The figure also matches the price the Company would later show itself prepared to pay for substantial planter holdings, which suggests an emerging benchmark for the institutional valuation of upland estates with full improvements. The choice to acquire the Lufkin parcel by direct purchase rather than by exchange suggests Lufkin himself preferred the cash. Many of the planter-Company transactions in the records had taken the form of land swaps, with the Company giving one parcel in return for another. The decision to take £350 0s 0d in sterling instead of an equivalent land exchange points to Lufkin preparing to leave the island or to invest the proceeds elsewhere, with the sterling figure offering a portable form of value that could travel back to England with him on the next available ship. The matching sterling structure of the Gurling £500 sale to Hoskison in October 1706 had reflected a similar departure-orientated transaction. The very full save harmless covenant suggests the Company anticipated some specific source of potential challenge to its new title. The standard early-modern risk in island land was a returning absent holder, a widow's claim, an unrecorded earlier grant or a creditor's lien. The comprehensiveness of Lufkin's undertaking indicates the Company's lawyers wanted full protection against any such latent claim, and the strength of the covenant points to the Company's awareness of the practical difficulties of investigating title to a working planter estate before completion. |

Eastop bound himself and his successors to ensure that the premises would be free and discharged from all encumbrances before Coole entered. The deed was made on 25 October 1687, in the third year of the reign of King James the Second. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Nairne and John Stevens. James Eastop signed by his mark in the form of a cross. John Coole then assigned all his right and title under the indenture to Edward Brayne and his assigns for ever. The assignment was made on 10 July 1688 and sealed and delivered in the presence of Ripon Wells and James Eastop, who signed by his mark in the form of a cross. John Coole signed by his mark in the form of C. Edward Brayne later assigned all his right and title under the same indenture to Edward Heath and his assigns for ever. The assignment was made on 7 April 1702 and witnessed by John Bagley and Leonard Stevens. Edward Brayne set his hand and seal to it. A separate memorandum recorded a sale by Richard Griffis, free planter of St Helena, to Charles Steward of the island. Griffis received £20 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand. He bargained, sold and delivered to Steward and his heirs for ever a parcel of twenty acres in Sandy Bay running up to the main ridge. The land adjoined the holdings of Andrew Wilson and Edward Bagley. All the appurtenances passed with the land. Steward was already in occupation of the parcel at the time of the sale. Interpretations The Eastop to Coole sale of 25 October 1687 brings a third early ten-acre transaction into the records, alongside the Jaye to Edmunds sale of 13 February 1683 and the Pratt to Casthope sale of 13 July 1687. The Fisher Valley parcel was sold for £8 0s 0d sterling, which fits the £8 0s 0d to £15 0s 0d range for upland ten-acre parcels established by the comparable Chapel Valley and Lemon Valley deeds. The sale shows the planter market in upland land developing systematically across the major valleys of the island within five years of the 1682 inquest. The chain of assignments running from Coole to Brayne in July 1688 and from Brayne to Heath in April 1702 is unusual in being recorded on the same indenture rather than by separate deeds. The Coole assignment was endorsed on the original Eastop deed nine months after Coole's purchase, and the Brayne assignment was endorsed nearly fourteen years later. The mechanism keeps the entire chain of title on a single document, with each successive holder taking the original deed forward with the endorsements as proof of the unbroken succession of the right and title. The recording of three different holders on the single indenture creates a documentary economy that contrasts with the practice of executing fresh deeds at each transfer. The endorsement of an assignment on the back of an earlier deed was a standard English conveyancing device, and its use here shows the island following metropolitan practice. The structure also gave the holders a built-in safeguard against the loss of intermediate paperwork, since the chain remained intact within a single physical document. Edward Heath's acquisition of the Fisher Valley parcel through this chain of assignments in 1702 fits with his other recorded dealings. He sold a messuage house and 7.5 acres to John French on 13 March 1705 for £50 0s 0d, assigned the Sandy Bay leasehold to Paul Charles on the same date, and sold his 20-acre Peak Gult holding to George Hoskison on 11 May 1704. The Fisher Valley parcel acquired through the Brayne assignment is therefore one element in a wider Heath |

The location at the main ridge above Sandy Bay would have been less productive than the head of Chapel Valley or Fisher Valley, with steeper ground, less reliable water and a more exposed position. The price difference therefore reflects the agricultural quality of the land rather than a depressed market. The boundary description of the Griffis parcel names Andrew Wilson and Edward Bagley as the adjoining holders. Andrew Wilson appears in the 1682 inquest as an original allottee, and the Bagley name has by now appeared across multiple branches of the family, with Edward Bagley emerging as a major figure at the head of Lemon Valley in the 1705 to 1708 records. The reference here places Edward Bagley as a holder at the main ridge above Sandy Bay as well, which expands the picture of his estate beyond the Lemon Valley records. Charles Steward's earlier history in the records includes his witnessing of the Cole to Swallow deed of 5 June 1705, the Gurling to Hoskison composite estate of 12 October 1706 and the Morris to Clavering deed of 3 July 1707. He had also appeared in the Bowman to Nicholls record as the adjoining holder to Nicholls's Fort James Valley dwelling house. The purchase of the Griffis twenty acres adds a substantial rural holding to his recorded position and confirms him as both a town-side and a country-side proprietor. The recital that Charles Steward was already in occupation of the parcel at the time of the sale points to an arrangement in which Steward had taken physical possession before formal title passed. The mechanism appears elsewhere in the records, including the Newman conveyance of 3 August 1708 in which Newman had built on Dufton land before the executors formalised the transfer. The pattern shows that informal occupation and the building of improvements on another planter's ground was a recognised precursor to legal acquisition, with the formal deed later catching up with the established physical reality. Speculations The decision to use a single indenture with successive endorsements rather than fresh deeds at each transfer suggests Coole, Brayne and Heath each preferred the documentary economy of the single instrument. The original Eastop deed contained the full description of the land and the bounds, and a new deed at each transfer would have required a fresh recitation of those particulars. By endorsing the assignment on the back of the original, each successor preserved the full title chain without re-drafting work, and the structure made the unbroken succession easier to demonstrate in any later dispute. The Griffis sale of twenty acres at £1 0s 0d per acre, against the £2 0s 0d per acre range for upland parcels at the heads of the major valleys, reflects either a particular feature of the Sandy Bay main ridge ground or a particular circumstance in the seller's position. Sandy Bay was characteristically warmer, drier and more exposed than the upper Chapel Valley and Lemon Valley sites, and the agricultural value of the land would have been correspondingly lower. The price points to Griffis being unable or unwilling to hold out for a higher figure, perhaps because the parcel was already physically occupied by Steward under the informal arrangement that the deed regularises. Charles Steward's pre-existing occupation of the Griffis parcel at the time of the sale suggests a working arrangement in which he had been farming the land under Griffis's title for some period before the formal |

The arrangement may have involved a tenancy, a partnership, or simply an informal understanding of the kind that the planter community sustained through personal credit and reputation. The conversion of that informal occupation into a freehold for £20 0s 0d let both parties settle the position, with Steward acquiring the secure title he needed to invest further in the land and Griffis taking his cash.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

The house adjoined the houses of Thomas Allis and Walter Morres, both free planters. The sale included the ground running from the back of the house down to the watercourse, with all appurtenances belonging to the property. The price was £25 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Hemon acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full receipt. Alexander and his heirs took the house, back kitchen and ground for ever, to their own proper use and behoof. Hemon covenanted that Alexander and his successors would enjoy the property peaceably and quietly without disturbance from him, his heirs or any person acting through him, and bound himself to save Alexander harmless from any claim. The deed was made on 12 April 1704 and sealed and delivered in the presence of John Lach and John Alexander. John Hemon set his hand and seal to it. A separate writing of 16 March 1710 recorded the onward sale of the same property by Richard Alexander to George Dweight, free planter. Alexander sold to Dweight the dwelling house, back kitchen and the ground running to the watercourse, with all appurtenances. The property was identified as adjoining the houses of Thomas Allis senior and John Clavering, the latter formerly Walter Morris. The price was £30 0s 0d in good current money of the island, secured to be paid under an obligation under Dweight's hand and seal bearing the same date as the deed. Dweight and his heirs took the property for ever, to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. Alexander gave the standard covenant of quiet enjoyment and bound himself to keep Dweight free of any disturbance arising through his own acts or those of any person claiming through him. The deed was sealed and delivered in the presence of Richard Gurling and John Alexander. Richard Alexander set his hand and seal to it. Interpretations The two Chapel Valley sales document the same property moving from a soldier into a free planter's hands in April 1704 and then onward to George Dweight in March 1710. The interval of nearly six years between the two deeds, and the £5 0s 0d appreciation from £25 0s 0d to £30 0s 0d, indicate a steady but modest rise in the urban property market. The figures sit well below the rates achieved by the more substantial Chapel Valley tenements such as Edmunds to Goodwin at £130 0s 0d sterling in May 1700, and confirm that the smaller dwelling houses with their backside ground formed a lower tier of urban property within the same valley. The boundary description of the property in the 1704 deed places it next to Thomas Allis and Walter Morres. The 1710 deed records the same property next to Thomas Allis senior and John Clavering, the latter described as formerly Walter Morris. The change of name on the eastern or western neighbour reflects the death of Walter Morris and the sale of his father's Chapel Valley dwelling house to John Clavering, |

The two records therefore preserve the practical sequence of urban turnover in this short stretch of Chapel Valley, with Morres giving way to Clavering between 1704 and 1710. The 16 March 1710 sale to George Dweight extends Dweight's documented presence in Chapel Valley beyond the 8 June 1708 purchase from William Marsh of the tenement formerly Thomas Heepedant's, which had been intended to give Dweight an urban property for around £30 0s 0d at the same time as he received £170 0s 0d from Belvard for his Sharks Valley estate. Dweight's acquisition of a second Chapel Valley house by 1710 confirms his continuing accumulation of urban property after the disposal of his rural Sharks Valley holdings, and shows him moving from the position of a Sharks Valley free planter to that of a Chapel Valley householder over a two-year period. The use of an obligation under hand and seal as the security for Dweight's payment of the £30 0s 0d is the operative feature of the 1710 deed. The cash was not paid in hand at sealing, as it had been in many of the earlier conveyances, but secured under a separate bond. The mechanism let Dweight take immediate possession of the property while postponing the actual handover of the money, and the obligation under hand and seal gave Alexander a contractual claim he could enforce independently of any dispute over the conveyance itself. The Hemon, Alexander and Dweight chain on this single Chapel Valley property shows the urban housing market operating across the boundaries between the garrison and the free planter community. John Hemon senior is described as a soldier, Richard Alexander as a free planter, and George Dweight as a free planter. The property passed from a serving member of the garrison to one civilian and then to another, with each holder taking possession of the same dwelling house and back kitchen and adding their name to the chain of title. The pattern documents the mobility of urban housing between these two recognised classes of inhabitants. The 1704 deed's description of John Hemon as senior introduces the qualifier needed to distinguish him from a younger man of the same name. The 20 February 1703 record had named Corporal John Hemon as the holder of twenty acres at the head of Fishers Valley and of a Chapel Valley house bought from the deceased Governor Helens. The Hemon name therefore appears as both senior and corporal in the same valley within a year, and the chronology suggests that the Hemon family had two adult members active in Chapel Valley property in the early 1700s. The presence of John Alexander as a witness to both the 1704 and the 1710 deeds, alongside the principal Richard Alexander, raises the question of a possible family connection. John Alexander served as the register and clerk of the council from at least 1686 and witnessed a very large number of transactions across the records. The recurrence of the Alexander surname for both the buyer and seller in 1704 and the witness in both 1704 and 1710 suggests Richard Alexander may have been a relative of John, and the connection would have given the family a direct interest in the documentary side of Chapel Valley property. The change of neighbour from Walter Morres to John Clavering between the 1704 and 1710 records preserves the death of Walter Morris in the formal chain of urban title. The 3 July 1707 sale by Walter Morris to John Clavering, identified in the records as the gunner's mate, transferred the late father Morris's dwelling house in Chapel Valley. The current 1710 deed, in identifying Clavering as the successor to Walter Morris on the adjoining ground, confirms that Clavering had taken physical possession of the property under that 1707 |

He had received £170 0s 0d from Belvard in June 1708 and paid £30 0s 0d to William Marsh in the same month, leaving him with a substantial surplus. By 1710 that surplus may have been committed to other purposes, and the bond mechanism let him take a second Chapel Valley house without immediately disbursing the cash. The arrangement points to Dweight building his urban portfolio in stages, with each acquisition timed to fit his available means. The £5 0s 0d appreciation in the property over six years works out at slightly more than a single shilling per acre-equivalent per year, which is a modest rate of return for the urban market. The figure suggests that Chapel Valley housing prices were relatively stable, or that Hemon's 1704 sale and Alexander's 1710 sale both reflected the cash needs of the sellers rather than the maximum value the property could fetch. The pattern would be consistent with a settled urban market in which dwelling houses changed hands at established rates determined by the type and size of the property rather than by speculative pressure. The grouping of Thomas Allis senior, John Clavering and the dwelling house at the centre of these deeds places the property at a particular point within the Chapel Valley streetscape. Thomas Allis senior had been a major landholder at the head of Deep Valley, and the Chapel Valley reference suggests he also held urban property. The clustering of named holders along a single watercourse line gives a glimpse of the physical organisation of Chapel Valley as a string of dwelling houses with their backside grounds running down to the water, with the boundary descriptions in the deeds preserving the sequence of houses along the line. |

Jonathan Higham signed by his mark. Interpretations The Lufkin to Alexander sale of 14 June 1712 documents the use of store credit as the operative medium of payment for a substantial urban property. The £170 0s 0d was not paid in cash, in sterling or in island currency, but secured against Lufkin's account in the books of the Right Honourable United Company. The mechanism converted a private property transaction into a paper transfer between Company accounts, with Alexander undertaking to settle the sum by issuing a corresponding charge against his own credit with the Company. The structure shows how the Company's books served as a settlement system for high-value transactions between planters, with the institution acting in effect as a clearing house. The earlier Lufkin bill of sale of 26 June 1707, in which he sold a dwelling house and thirty acres to the Company for £350 0s 0d in good and lawful money of England, established Lufkin as a substantial planter with property next to the Company's main pastureland. The current sale of an urban Chapel Valley dwelling house in 1712 confirms that Lufkin had retained or acquired other property after the 1707 transaction, and shows him continuing to dispose of holdings on the island. The choice of store credit rather than sterling for the 1712 sale, against the sterling payment for the 1707 sale, points to differences in either the parties' arrangements or the type of asset involved. The boundary description of the Chapel Valley house, naming Matthew Bazett and James Draper as the adjoining holders, places the property at a particular point in the urban core. Bazett had built his country estate at Sheel Valley and Deep Valley through purchases from Dweight, Higham and Mudge, while James Draper appears in the 1698 inquest as an original Chapel Valley holder. The presence of both names as the boundary holders to the Lufkin house identifies it as one of the established urban properties along a continuous line of dwellings. The Higham to Bell sale of 28 September 1708 documents a smaller transaction at the head of one of the upland valleys. The six-acre parcel with its dwelling house and conveniences sold for £25 0s 0d, which fits the lower end of the upland market established by comparable deeds. The Higham name had earlier appeared in the records as the seller of small Chapel Valley plots to Robert Bell on 3 August 1704 and to Matthew Bazett on 19 December 1706. The September 1708 deed therefore extends the chain of Higham-Bell dealings into a more substantial transaction involving a fully developed working unit rather than just a building plot. The recital that the price was secured to be paid at the rate of Mr Watters money introduces an explicit reference to the rate of exchange between different forms of island currency. Mr Watters money probably represents a particular standard of valuation that had emerged within the island's monetary system, perhaps tied to a specific class of coin or to an accepted commercial rate that the local merchant Mr Watters maintained for his own transactions. The reference shows that island currency was not a single unified medium but a collection of accepted standards, each with its own conversion rate against the others. The reference to other good and sufficient consideration moving Higham, in addition to the £25 0s 0d secured to be paid by Bell, preserves the standard formula for keeping a further element of the bargain off |

The mechanism appeared earlier in the Trapp to Goodwin sale of 10 February 1690 in the form of divers other good causes and considerations, and shows the planter community's continuing reliance on this drafting convention to acknowledge unspecified side arrangements. The presence of John Alexander as a witness to the Lufkin to Alexander deed of June 1712 raises a question about the propriety of the register witnessing a transaction in which a man bearing his surname was the buyer. Alexander had served as the register and clerk of the council from at least 1686, and the recurrence of his surname for the principal in the deed suggests that Richard Alexander was probably a relative. The witnessing of a deed in favour of a relative was not necessarily improper under the standards of the period, but it shows the Alexander family's continuing institutional role in the registration of property transactions. Speculations The seventeen-year accumulation in property by Richard Alexander between his April 1704 purchase of the Chapel Valley dwelling house from John Hemon for £25 0s 0d, his sale of that property to George Dweight in March 1710 for £30 0s 0d on a bond, and his June 1712 purchase of the Lufkin house for £170 0s 0d in store credit, shows a steady upward trajectory in his holdings. The figures suggest that Alexander was moving from modest urban property towards more substantial premises, and the use of store credit for the 1712 transaction indicates he had accumulated a meaningful balance with the Company by that date. The reference to Mr Watters money in the Higham to Bell deed suggests that Mr Watters had achieved some institutional standing on the island as a recognised merchant or financial intermediary. The naming of a money rate after a particular person is unusual within the records, and the appearance of the term in a formal conveyance indicates that the rate had become a known and accepted standard within the planter community. The mechanism may have arisen from Watters operating as a money-changer or commodity dealer who set the working rates for converting different forms of island currency. The decision by Higham to sell six acres and a dwelling house for £25 0s 0d points to a particular financial pressure on his household by September 1708. The lower price reflects either the smaller acreage at six rather than ten acres, the lesser quality of the ground, or a need to realise cash quickly. The combination of the secured payment, the reference to Mr Watters money and the recital of other consideration suggests the transaction was constructed to give Higham a particular outcome in store credit or commercial advantage, rather than a simple disposal of land for the open market value. |

Robert Gurling set his hand and seal to it. The papers were delivered to Mary Carne, since George Carne was then absent from the island. John Alexander recorded the delivery. A separate memorandum recorded a temporary arrangement between Gabriel Powell and James Sich made on 18 December 1707. Powell, for divers matters and causes moving him, let and set over to Sich twenty acres of land formerly belonging to the late John Beale. The arrangement was to run until the Company should determine the proper ownership of the land. Sich covenanted to redeliver the parcel to Powell or his heirs at the end of the term in as good a condition as it had been at the time of his entry. He further bound himself to make good any damages, costs, suits or demands that might arise, and to keep Powell and his heirs indemnified against any encumbrances. Sich also undertook not to fell or sell any green wood growing on the land. The deed was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Free and John Alexander. Gabriel Powell and James Sich each set their hand and seal to it. Interpretations The Gurling to Carne sale of 1 April 1709 fixes the price of fifteen acres in Fryer Valley at £55 0s 0d in island currency, which works out at about £3 13s 4d per acre. The figure stands well above the £1 0s 0d to £2 0s 0d per acre range that had applied at the heads of the major valleys earlier in the decade, and confirms that Fryer Valley land continued to command premium prices. The earlier Bradley to Belvard sale of October 1705 and Belvard to Gurling sale of August 1708 had both involved Fryer Valley land, and the upward movement in valuations is consistent across these transactions. The boundary description of the Carne purchase shows that Mr Carne already held the parcel to the south, with the new acquisition consolidating his position to the north of his existing holding. The arrangement gives Carne a continuous block of Fryer Valley land, with the Company's Great Plantation to the east and the Gurling and Morres parcels to the north and west. The pattern reflects the standard accumulation strategy by which successful planters built up contiguous holdings rather than scattered parcels. The delivery of the papers to Mary Carne in her husband's absence is the operative procedural feature of the deed. George Carne was again absent from the island, as he had been when his wife Mary acted as his attorney in the purchase of fifteen acres from Robert Leach on 4 January 1705. The Carne household's pattern of trading through Mary while her husband was absent therefore extends across at least four years, and the delivery of the present deed into Mary's hands rather than to George shows John Alexander acknowledging her established role as the local representative of her husband's interests. The Powell to Sich arrangement of 18 December 1707 reveals a category of land dealing that the records have not previously documented in detail. The land had formerly belonged to the late John Beale, but the question of who properly owned it was still pending before the Company. Powell handed twenty acres over to Sich on the basis that Sich would farm and hold the land until the Company resolved the matter. The mechanism let the land continue to produce while the title question was being determined, with Sich taking the practical occupation and Powell retaining the residual claim. The covenant against felling or selling green wood is a particular feature of the Powell to Sich arrangement. Green wood on St Helena would have been a substantial resource, both for fuel and for construction, |

As an occupier holding under an arrangement that might end at any time when the Company made its determination, Sich could work the land but not extract its capital value through woodcutting. The structure preserved the underlying timber asset for whichever party the Company eventually recognised as the rightful owner. The pending Company determination of the title to the John Beale parcel points to a class of cases in which the death of a planter without a clear successor led the Company to take the property into its own hands for adjudication. John Beale had died, and the parcel may have been claimed by Powell on some basis that the Company was still examining. The arrangement with Sich let the dispute proceed without leaving the land unworked, and shows the institutional flexibility by which the Company managed the inevitable gaps in succession that arose in a small planter population. Richard Gurling appears here both as the seller of the fifteen acres in his role as Robert Gurling and as the witness to the deed. The two Gurlings are clearly different men, with Robert holding the fifteen acres being sold and Richard holding the ten acres on the northern boundary. The relationship between them is not specified in the deed, but the pattern of joint witnessing and adjacent holdings suggests they were closely related, perhaps as brothers or as father and son, and they had earlier appeared together in the records as principal and witness to multiple transactions. The Beale name had earlier appeared in the records as the orphans of Jonathan Beale, whose Purslane Bed near the head of Chapel Valley was named as a boundary feature in the Paul Graton Lemon Garden lease of 23 December 1707, and as the late Ellenor Beale, whose legacy descended through her daughter Ellenor Price and was administered by William Chevalls and George Carne in 1707. The late John Beale identified here may be another member of the same family, and the Company's ongoing examination of the title would have formed part of the wider settlement of the Beale estate across multiple parties. Speculations George Carne's continuing absences from the island, combined with Mary Carne's role as his attorney and recipient of deeds in his name, suggest that Carne's commercial interests took him away from St Helena for extended periods on a regular basis. The descriptions of him as merchant in earlier deeds and his involvement in financial custodianship for figures like Bento Pedro Demallo and the Beale legacy point to a man whose business reached beyond the island. The pattern of long absences would be consistent with Carne running a shipping or trading operation that called at multiple ports across the East India Company's network, with the St Helena estate administered by his wife during his voyages. The Powell to Sich arrangement points to a particular set of circumstances surrounding the late John Beale's estate that the Company had not yet resolved by December 1707. The decision to let twenty acres pass into Sich's working occupation under a redelivery covenant suggests the Company was content to leave the matter pending while the land continued to be productive. The mechanism may reflect the Company's preference for keeping land in active cultivation rather than allowing it to lie idle during a title dispute, and the choice of Sich as the temporary occupier indicates he had the means and the inclination to take on the land without owning it. Gabriel Powell's role as the party with apparent control over the disputed Beale parcel, and his willingness to hand it over to Sich on temporary terms, suggests he held some kind of preliminary claim that the |

The sum was paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Dweight acknowledged its receipt and gave a full discharge. The house adjoined the dwelling then in the possession of Dorothy Hayes. The chain of earlier ownership was recited in the deed: the house had formerly belonged to the late Thomas Harper, who sold it to William Marsh, free planter, who in turn sold it to Dweight. Marsden and his heirs took the house with all appurtenances for ever, to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. The deed was made on 12 April 1709 and witnessed by John Roberts, Thomas Goodwin, Edward Walkborne and Daniel Griffeth. George Dweight and William Marsden each signed. A separate memorandum recorded a further sale by George Dweight on 9 May 1709. Dweight sold to John Clavering, gunner's mate, a dwelling house in Chapel Valley for £20 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Dweight acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. The house adjoined Clavering's own house and the house of Thomas Allis senior. Clavering and his heirs took the house with all appurtenances for ever, to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. Interpretations The two Dweight sales of April and May 1709 continue the pattern of urban property disposal that had begun with his June 1708 transactions. In June 1708 Dweight had received £170 0s 0d from Walter Belvard for his Sharks Valley estate and paid £30 0s 0d to William Marsh for the Chapel Valley tenement formerly Thomas Heepedant's. By 1710 he had bought a second Chapel Valley dwelling from Richard Alexander for £30 0s 0d on a bond. The current April 1709 sale of £20 0s 0d for the Fort James Valley house and the May 1709 sale of £20 0s 0d for the Chapel Valley house show Dweight selling rather than buying at this point, which suggests his accumulation phase had given way to consolidation. The recital of the chain of ownership in the Marsden purchase, with the house running from the late Thomas Harper through William Marsh to George Dweight, gives an unusually full statement of the documentary history. Most conveyances in the records identify only the immediate previous holder, but this deed names three earlier owners. The detail probably reflects Marsden's concern as a member of the council to establish a clear chain of title before paying his £20 0s 0d, with the recital intended to demonstrate that Dweight held a clean and unencumbered position derived from a recognised line of successive owners. The Thomas Harper named here as the earlier holder is the same planter who had appeared as the seller of the twenty acres at the head of Sarahs Valley to James Casthoke on 27 March 1694 for £30 0s 0d, the |

The current deed adds an urban dwelling house in Fort James Valley to his recorded estate, and shows him as a holder of property across both rural Sarahs Valley and the urban centre near the fort. The William Marsh identified as the intermediate seller in this chain is probably the same William Marsh who had appeared in the Edward Gardener inheritance settlement of 1703 and 1705, transferring twenty acres to William Dufton and ten to George Dweight on behalf of his son Robert Marsh. The May 1709 deed therefore extends the recorded dealings between William Marsh and George Dweight beyond the Sharks Valley parcels and the substitute settlement, with Marsh also acting as the seller of the Fort James Valley house to Dweight at some earlier date. The £20 0s 0d price for each of the two houses establishes the going rate for ordinary urban dwellings in the area around Fort James and Chapel Valley at this date. The figure sits below the £25 0s 0d that Hemon had received from Alexander in 1704 and the £30 0s 0d that Alexander had taken from Dweight in 1710, but matches the £20 0s 0d that John Bowman had received for his Fort James Valley dwelling and the £20 0s 0d that James Draper had received from Samuel Maxwell in 1699 for a messuage near Fort James. The market for these smaller urban properties was therefore relatively stable across a fifteen-year period. The Clavering purchase of 9 May 1709 brings together two dwelling houses under his control in Chapel Valley. He had bought the late Walter Morris's father's house from Walter Morris on 3 July 1707 for £40 0s 0d, and the May 1709 deed adds an adjoining property that lay between his existing house and that of Thomas Allis senior. The acquisition gives Clavering a continuous frontage in Chapel Valley, and the structure mirrors the consolidation pattern that George Carne had pursued in his Fryer Valley accumulation. John Clavering's office as gunner's mate fixes him in the garrison structure rather than among the free planter community. The garrison's gunner's mate would have had a regular Company salary and the institutional standing that came with a recognised military position, and the role gave him both the means and the social connection to acquire property in the urban centre. The earlier 28 May 1703 sale by Thomas Ashby to Hugh Bodley, in which Clavering was a witness, shows him as an established figure in the small Chapel Valley network from at least that date. William Marsden's purchase of the Fort James Valley house in his capacity as third in council marks the second appearance of a senior council member acquiring private property in the records of this period. Edward Walkborne had taken the mortgage over Smiths Plain from John Bagley on 20 July 1708, and Marsden now adds his own dwelling house acquisition. The pattern shows the senior council members systematically building their personal estates alongside their official duties, with their institutional position giving them access to opportunities that ordinary planters could not match. Speculations The pricing of the Marsden and Clavering houses at £20 0s 0d each, despite their different locations in Fort James Valley and Chapel Valley, suggests that ordinary single-dwelling urban properties had reached a settled price point on the island. The figure represents the standard cost of acquiring a dwelling house with its appurtenances and back-side ground but without significant rural land attached. The stability of the price across multiple transactions and over a period of years would have made urban housing an attractive form of |

The combined receipts from the 1708 and 1709 transactions came to £190 0s 0d in cash plus the Chapel Valley tenement bought from Marsh for £30 0s 0d, against the £40 0s 0d paid out across the two 1709 sales. The pattern points to Dweight either preparing to leave the island or rebuilding his cash position after a period of substantial investment, with the dwelling houses being released to free up capital from holdings he no longer needed. The decision by Clavering to take an additional Chapel Valley house adjoining his existing dwelling, rather than buying property in a different part of the urban core, suggests he was positioning himself as a substantial Chapel Valley householder. The combined frontage of two adjacent houses would have given him standing among the urban property holders and the practical benefit of a larger contiguous holding. The pattern matches the trajectory of garrison members like John French, who had moved from a soldier's basic standing to ownership of a messuage house and rural ground, and confirms that the gunner's mate role provided a settled platform for building a town-based estate.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

The land included all appurtenances of whatever nature or kind. The price was £350 0s 0d, already received by Hoskison from Powell. Hoskison acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. Powell and his heirs took the house and the fifty acres for ever, to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. Hoskison covenanted that Powell and his successors would peacefully and quietly possess and enjoy the property without any challenge, demand or claim, and bound himself to save Powell and his heirs harmless against any disturbance. The deed was made on 7 September 1706 and sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of George Carne and John Alexander. George Hoskison set his hand and seal to it. A separate writing was made by Owen Bevia, free planter of St Helena, to James Greentree, also a free planter of the island. Bevia sold to Greentree a house in Chapel Valley for £35 0s 0d in lawful money, paid in hand. Bevia acknowledged the sum as received. The price was structured as follows: For the house £30 0s 0d For a room adjoining the house £5 0s 0d The adjoining room was subject to a reservation. Bevia retained the use of it during his natural life. On his death, the room was to fall to Greentree, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns for ever. Bevia warranted the house and the room to Greentree and his successors against all manner of persons and undertook to defend the title for ever. The deed was made on the ninth day of October in the third year of the reign. Interpretations The Hoskison to Powell sale of 7 September 1706 documents one of the highest-value transactions on record at this date. The £350 0s 0d for a dwelling house and fifty acres in branches of Chapel Valley sits at the upper end of the recorded planter market and matches the £350 0s 0d that John Lufkin received from the Company on 26 June 1707 for his thirty-acre estate next |

The figure shows that Powell was prepared to commit substantial capital to upland Chapel Valley property, and his accumulation here precedes by less than two years his role in handing twenty acres of disputed Beale land to James Sich under the temporary arrangement of 18 December 1707. The transaction sits within a broader pattern of Hoskison disposals and acquisitions in 1706. Five weeks after this sale to Powell, Hoskison received the £500 0s 0d composite estate from Richard Gurling on 12 October 1706, which included a tenement house, thirty acres at Little Horse Pasture, twenty acres at the head of Lemon Valley, growing yams, livestock and a black mare. The September sale to Powell therefore preceded a substantial inbound acquisition, and the two transactions taken together show Hoskison rotating his portfolio rather than simply liquidating it. George Carne's appearance as the witness to the Hoskison to Powell deed, alongside John Alexander, places him at the heart of the Chapel Valley transaction. Carne's own dealings included the purchase of the small Chapel Valley plot from Richard Gurling in May 1704, the gift of that plot to his daughter-in-law Ellinor Keeling later the same month, and the purchase of fifteen acres at the head of Fryer Valley from Robert Leach in January 1705 through his wife as attorney. His role here as witness to a transaction between two major Chapel Valley players reflects his standing within the urban property network. The Bevia to Greentree sale of 9 October introduces an unusual arrangement in which the seller retained a life interest in a room adjoining the house. The structure separates the £30 0s 0d for the house from the £5 0s 0d for the room, with the room sold in remainder rather than in possession. Bevia kept the use of the room for his natural life, and Greentree took the underlying ownership with the right to enter on Bevia's death. The mechanism is a small-scale version of the reversionary settlement, and it let Bevia convert his ownership into immediate cash while retaining residential accommodation for the rest of his life. The Owen Bevia of the October 1706 sale is the father-in-law of Thomas Goodwin who had been recorded as making the family settlement of 22 September 1705. That settlement transferred his twenty-acre Company grant to Goodwin to take effect after Bevia and his wife's deaths, with a contingent remainder to Goodwin's eldest son John Goodwin if he lived on the island. Bevia's continued activity into October 1706, more than a year after the family settlement, shows he was still alive and managing his urban property. The decision to retain a life interest in a single room indicates a deliberate downsizing of his Chapel Valley accommodation while preserving the practical means of remaining in residence. James Greentree appears here as the buyer of the Bevia house. His earlier presence in the records includes his witnessing of the Bevia to Goodwin family settlement of 22 September 1705, where the Bevia, Casthope and Greentree names all appeared together on the same document. The current transaction therefore extends the Bevia-Greentree connection beyond witness and principal into a direct property dealing, and the purchase places Greentree as a substantial urban property holder alongside the principal Chapel Valley figures. The pricing structure of the Bevia sale, with separate figures for the house and the adjoining room, reflects the careful valuation that the life-interest arrangement required. The £5 0s 0d allocated to the room represents what Greentree was prepared to pay now for an asset he would not actually take until Bevia's death. The figure therefore captures the present value of a future remainder, and the parties' |

The premium reflects either a particularly productive set of holdings within the Chapel Valley system, the inclusion of substantial improvements that pushed the price above the bare land value, or a strategic interest on Powell's part in acquiring this specific consolidated estate. The pattern of Powell's subsequent transactions, including the disputed Beale parcel handed to Sich in 1707, suggests he was building a substantial position in the upper Chapel Valley area. The decision by Owen Bevia to retain a life interest in a single room rather than in the whole house points to a deliberate household arrangement. The separation suggests that the room had a particular function for him, perhaps as a private chamber or as the only space he needed at his age, while the rest of the house could pass into Greentree's immediate occupation. The mechanism let the two households coexist within the same building, with Greentree taking the principal residence and Bevia retaining a fixed room as an annexe. The arrangement reflects the practical realities of urban property within a small island community where space was at a premium and where elderly planters needed continuing accommodation. Hoskison's pattern of substantial sales and acquisitions across 1706, with £350 0s 0d received from Powell in September and £500 0s 0d paid out to Gurling in October, suggests an active commercial strategy rather than a simple liquidation. The five-week interval between the two transactions, combined with the difference in the assets, indicates that Hoskison was reorganising his portfolio: selling fifty acres in branches of Chapel Valley and buying thirty acres at Little Horse Pasture, twenty at the head of Lemon Valley, plus a tenement house, growing yams, livestock and a mare. The rebalancing points to a deliberate move from one set of holdings to another within a single planning horizon. |

The deed was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Sanderson and Robert Addes. Bevia signed by his mark in the form of O B. A separate writing was made by John French, gunner in the pay and service of the Right Honourable United Company, to William Dufton, free planter of St Helena. French sold to Dufton a piece of ground in Chapel Valley adjoining the house of Sutton Isaack senior, free planter. The sale included the walls as then standing and built on the ground, together with all other stones gathered to hand. The price was £7 0s 0d, paid in two components as follows: In a heifer £5 15s 0dIn store credit £1 5s 0d French acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. John French set his hand and seal to it. A separate writing was made by Gabriel Powell, free planter of St Helena, to James Greentree, free planter of the island. Powell sold to Greentree a parcel of twenty acres of land for £86 0s 0d in lawful money, paid in hand. Powell acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. Interpretations The French to Dufton sale of 12 March 1705 documents one of the smallest transactions in the records. The total price of £7 0s 0d represents the lowest figure recorded for a piece of urban ground with structural improvements, and the inclusion of standing walls and gathered stones in the sale identifies the parcel as a building plot rather than a developed dwelling. The structure suggests that French had begun construction on the ground but had not completed a dwelling house, and was selling the partly improved plot to Dufton for the latter to complete or use as he thought fit. The split of the consideration between £5 15s 0d in a heifer and £1 5s 0d in store credit shows the small-scale commercial transactions of the planter community using their fullest range of available media. A single heifer carries most of the value, with the balance settled through the Company's books. The mechanism let French take a productive animal for breeding or for further trading, while clearing the residual sum through the institutional channel that the Company maintained for credit between planters and the store. The composite payment also reveals the precision with which livestock were valued in island transactions. The heifer was assigned a value of £5 15s 0d, which fits within the range established by other recorded valuations of cattle on the island. The figure shows that planters had developed a reasonably consistent set of price expectations for cattle of different ages and types, with single heifers valued at a price point that allowed them to function as units of significant value in commercial transactions. John French's identification here as gunner in the pay and service of the Company places him in a particular position within the garrison structure. The 13 March 1705 sale by Edward Heath to John French of a messuage house and 7.5 acres for £50 0s 0d had identified him as chief gunner of the garrison of Fort James. The current deed, made the day before the Heath purchase, identifies him simply as gunner. The two transactions together show French moving between the role of buyer and seller within a single 48-hour period, and his disposal of the Chapel Valley plot to Dufton on 12 March may have been part of raising funds or simplifying his holdings ahead of the larger Heath acquisition on 13 March. The Gabriel Powell to James Greentree sale of twenty acres for £86 0s 0d sets a rate of about £4 6s 0d per acre, which sits comfortably within the upland market for substantial parcels. The figure is well above the £1 0s 0d per acre rate of the Sandy Bay main ridge ground in the Griffiths to Steward sale and below the £7 0s 0d per acre rate of the Hoskison to Powell sale of 7 September 1706. The price points to a parcel of average quality within the upland system, neither at the bottom nor at the top of the market range. James Greentree's purchase here is a further substantial acquisition following his October 1706 purchase of the Bevia house in Chapel Valley with the life-interest reservation. The two transactions together establish him as both an urban property holder and a rural landowner of twenty acres at this period. The combination of a town residence and a substantial upland parcel reflects the typical structure of an established free planter's estate, and Greentree's |

Isaack had made the gift of one acre to his grandson Stephen Audouart on 29 October 1698, with the parental household of Bartrant Audouart retaining custodianship during the child's minority. The current deed shows Isaack still established in Chapel Valley seven years later, and his appearance as the principal neighbouring holder confirms his settled position in this part of the island. Sutton Isaack's appearance as a witness to the French to Dufton deed, in addition to his identification as the neighbouring holder, gives him a double role in the transaction. He acted both as the man whose house lay next to the ground being sold and as one of the witnesses confirming the conveyance. The combination is unusual but not improper, since witnessing a neighbouring transaction simply confirmed that he had seen the parties seal and deliver the deed. The role gave Isaack standing in the documentary record of his immediate neighbourhood. Speculations The decision by John French to dispose of the partly improved Chapel Valley plot for £7 0s 0d on 12 March, the day before his purchase from Edward Heath of a messuage house and 7.5 acres for £50 0s 0d, suggests a deliberate sequencing of transactions to fund his larger acquisition. The £7 0s 0d would not have covered any significant part of the £50 0s 0d Heath purchase, but the receipt of a heifer and store credit may have been useful in clearing other obligations or in providing immediate working assets. The pattern points to French managing a household and Company-service portfolio across multiple transactions in a short period. The inclusion of gathered stones in the sale to Dufton, alongside the standing walls, indicates that French had been actively assembling building materials on the ground. The reference to all other stones gathered to hand suggests a stockpile of cut or selected stones ready for use in further construction. The phrasing recognises that the building materials had value in themselves, separate from the ground or the partly completed walls, and the inclusion of all three in the £7 0s 0d price reflects a comprehensive transfer of the building project as a single asset. The Greentree pattern of substantial purchases across 1705 and 1706 points to a household in expansion. The Beviau house with life-interest reservation in October 1705 gave him a town residence, and the Powell twenty acres around the same period gave him substantial rural land. The two acquisitions together represent a major commitment of capital, and the source of his funds is not visible in the records reviewed so far. The pattern may indicate inheritance, accumulated trading profits, or a particular commercial position that gave him liquidity at this point. |

Gabriel Powell set his hand and seal to it. A separate indenture was made on 20 August 1707 between Daniel Griffeth and Jonathan Doveton, executors of the late William Doveton, free planter, of the one part, and Hugh Bodley, soldier and free planter of the island, of the other part. The executors, acting under the power given them by William Doveton's will to dispose of and provide for his children, placed Elizabeth Doveton, the second daughter of the deceased, as an apprentice with Bodley. She was to live with him from the date of the indenture until she came of age or until her marriage, whichever happened first. During the term Elizabeth was to serve Bodley faithfully in all lawful business according to her ability, and to behave honestly and obediently towards her master, his wife and his family. In consideration of her youth and want of apparel, the executors agreed to pay Bodley the following sums out of Elizabeth's portion under the will: For her bringing up and education £11 0s 0d, payable in cash or good store credit For Bodley's use during her term £6 0s 0d, payable in cash or good store credit, repayable to Elizabeth when she came of age or married The arrangement was made on conditions that Bodley would: Teach Elizabeth to read and to work with her needle together with the Church catechism and other things suitable for a good housewife, either by himself or by causing her to be so taught Provide her with sufficient meat, drink, apparel, washing and lodging together with all other things fitting for such an apprenticeship Pay £6 0s 0d to Elizabeth or her heirs at the end of the term or on her marriage or to the executors if she died during her minority The deed was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Swallow and Joshua Johnson. Daniel Griffeth, Jonas Doveton and Hugh Bodley each set their hands and seals to it. Interpretations The inclusion of the male slave Oliver and the half-share in a still, with half the worm and half the tubs, in the Powell to Greentree sale of 11 March 1703 reveals the scope of a composite plantation transaction. The deed conveys land, growing crops, a named slave and shared ownership in distilling equipment as a single package for £86 0s 0d. The structure shows that planters treated such transactions as transfers of working productive units rather than as simple sales of acreage, with all the elements needed to operate the holding moving together. The half-share in the still is the most distinctive feature of the transaction. A still with its worm, the coiled condensing pipe, and its tubs would have been used for distilling spirits from sugar cane, fruit or other fermentable material grown on the plantation. The fact that Powell held only half-shares of these items shows that distilling on the island was sometimes carried on in partnership, with two planters jointly owning the equipment needed to produce spirits. The transfer of his half to Greentree therefore brought Greentree into the partnership with whoever held the other half. The naming of the slave Oliver in the body of the deed, alongside the land, the plantation and the distilling equipment, treats him as part of the working assets of the holding. The pattern matches the Trapp to Goodwin sale of 10 February 1690, in which the slave Asher was named in the conveyance. The practice of naming individual slaves in land deeds rather than |

The will of the late William Doveton gave his executors the power to dispose of and provide for his children, and the indenture exercises that power by placing the second daughter Elizabeth in Bodley's household as an apprentice. The mechanism converts the parental duty of upbringing into a contractual relationship between the executors and an outside master, with specified educational and material obligations on the master's side. The financial structure of the indenture is the operative feature explaining how the apprenticeship was funded. The executors paid Bodley £11 0s 0d outright for her bringing up and education, and a further £6 0s 0d that Bodley was to have the use of during the term but was required to repay to Elizabeth when she came of age or married. The total of £17 0s 0d represents the cost of placing a daughter into an apprenticeship that would discharge the family's continuing responsibility for her, with the £6 0s 0d repayment functioning as a portion that she would receive on her exit from the apprenticeship. The educational obligations on Bodley are specified in detail: to teach Elizabeth to read, to work with her needle, the Church catechism and what else was convenient. The combination of literacy, needlework and religious instruction marks out the standard curriculum for a young woman in the period, and the inclusion of household business fitting for a good housewife identifies the practical training that would prepare her for her own household after the apprenticeship ended. The structure shows the apprenticeship serving as an educational and domestic placement rather than as commercial training in a trade. The condition that Elizabeth would be released at her age or her day of marriage, whichever came first, recognises the dual paths by which a young woman of the period could exit such an apprenticeship. Coming of age would discharge her from the apprenticeship automatically, while marriage would discharge her by passing her into a husband's household. The provision in the deed for the £6 0s 0d to be paid either to Elizabeth herself or to the executors in case of her death during her minority shows the parties planning carefully for each contingency. Hugh Bodley's identification as both a soldier and a free planter in the indenture reflects his accumulated standing on the island. His earlier acquisition of the messuage house in Chapel Valley from Thomas Ashby on 28 May 1703 for £15 0s 0d in store credit, the subsequent recorded sale by James Grandy to Thomas Ashby and onward to Bodley, and his acquisition of the female slave Sue from Jonathan Doveton on 13 August 1708 establish his pattern of growing his household. The taking on of Elizabeth Doveton as an apprentice extends that pattern beyond property and slave-holding into the educational and domestic dimensions of a substantial household. Speculations The decision by the executors to place Elizabeth with Bodley specifically, rather than with another candidate, suggests an existing relationship between the Doveton and Bodley households that the indenture builds upon. The 13 August 1708 slave exchange between Bodley and Jonathan Doveton would extend that relationship by almost exactly a year, suggesting that the apprenticeship may have been part of a broader |

The placement also gave the executors confidence that the educational and material conditions would be met, since Bodley's domestic establishment was a known quantity to them. The structure of the £11 0s 0d outright payment plus the £6 0s 0d repayable sum reflects a careful balance between the master's compensation and the child's preserved portion. Bodley received a substantial fee for taking the daughter into his household, but the executors retained a contingent claim on £6 0s 0d that would either reach Elizabeth on her majority or marriage, or revert to the estate if she died during her minority. The mechanism let the executors discharge their immediate duty of placement while preserving the daughter's expected portion under the will until she could receive it directly. The half-share in the still in the Powell to Greentree sale points to the operation of small-scale distilling among the planter community of Sandy Bay and the head of Lemon Valley. The half-ownership of the still, the worm and the tubs would have required Greentree to continue working with whoever held the other half. The arrangement suggests that distilling on the island was a cooperative activity, perhaps because the equipment was expensive to acquire as a whole, the volume of fermentable material from a single plantation was insufficient to justify a dedicated still, or there was a practical advantage to two households sharing the labour of operating the equipment.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |

The executors, Daniel Griffeth and Jonathan Doveton, placed Susanna Doveton, the third daughter of the deceased, as an apprentice with Robert Leech, free planter of the island. The placement was made under the same power conferred by William Doveton's will to dispose of and provide for his children. Susanna was to live with Leech from the date of the indenture until she came of age or until her marriage, whichever happened first. During the term she was to serve Leech faithfully in all lawful business according to her ability, and to behave honestly and obediently towards her master, his wife and his family. In consideration of her youth and want of apparel, the executors paid Leech the following out of Susanna's portion under the will: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>In cash or credit £5 0s 0d</li> <li>The service of a black boy named Peter during the term</li> <li>Livestock one cow and one calf</li> </ul> Leech accepted the placement on the following conditions: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>To teach Susanna to read and work with her needle together with the Church catechism and other things suitable for a good housewife, by himself or by causing her to be taught</li> <li>To provide her with sufficient meat, drink, apparel, washing and lodging together with all other things fitting and convenient for such an apprenticeship</li> <li>To deliver to Susanna at the end of the term or on her marriage the black boy Peter, if then living, and a cow and a calf to the value of £6 0s 0d, or that value in money or credit; in case of her death during her minority, the same items were to be delivered to the executors</li> </ul> The indenture was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Thomas Swallow and Joshua Johnson. Daniel Griffeth, Jonathan Doveton and Robert Leech each set their hands and seals to it. A separate writing was made by Thomas Toster, soldier of St Helena, to Samuel Jeffrey. Toster sold to Jeffrey twenty-two acres of land at the head of Fishery |

Elizabeth's placement with Hugh Bodley involved £11 0s 0d outright and a £6 0s 0d repayable portion, a total of £17 0s 0d in cash and credit. Susanna's placement with Robert Leech involved only £5 0s 0d in cash, supplemented by the service of the black boy Peter for the term and a cow and a calf, with the equivalent value of livestock to be returned to her at the end of the term. The difference reflects either the executors' assessment of the relative quality of the placements or a deliberate variation in the form of provision for each child. The transfer of the black boy Peter into Leech's service for the duration of Susanna's apprenticeship, with the obligation to return him to Susanna at the end of the term if living, treats the slave's labour as a form of property attached to the daughter's portion. The mechanism mirrors the way livestock formed part of the consideration, with the slave's working capacity treated as a yielding asset rather than as a chattel sold outright. The structure preserves Susanna's underlying interest in Peter as part of her share of her father's estate while letting Leech enjoy the practical benefit of his labour during the apprenticeship. The contingent provision that Peter would be delivered to the executors if Susanna died during her minority, in the same way as the cattle and the cash equivalent, gives the executors a continuing reversionary interest in the assets earmarked for the daughter. The arrangement preserves the estate's claim on her portion under the will, with the assets returning to the executors for redistribution among the remaining beneficiaries if Susanna did not survive to claim them herself. The educational and material obligations on Leech are identical to those on Bodley in the Elizabeth indenture: teaching to read, needlework, the Church catechism and household business fitting for a good housewife, together with sufficient meat, drink, apparel, washing and lodging. The standardisation of these terms across the two indentures shows that the executors were applying a uniform template for the placement of the daughters, with the financial and material consideration varying but the substantive duties on each master remaining the same. The Toster to Jeffrey sale of twenty-two acres at the head of Fishery Valley sets the price at about £3 12s 0d per acre, which falls within the upland market established by other deeds. The deferred payment structure, with £50 0s 0d paid at sealing and £30 0s 0d secured for payment on 29 February following, gave Jeffrey a credit window of about eleven months to find the balance. The use of a separate obligation under hand and seal for the deferred portion mirrors the arrangement in the Richard Alexander to George Dweight sale of 16 March 1710, where the entire £30 0s 0d was secured by a bond rather than paid in hand. The 29 February completion date for the deferred payment is unusual and suggests the deed was made in a leap year, since 29 February exists only in those years. The agreement to pay on a date that would not exist in three years out of four implies that the parties were aware of the leap year and used the specific date as a |

The mechanism may also have reflected a particular point in the agricultural or commercial cycle when Jeffrey expected to have the funds available. Thomas Beurnham appears here as the boundary holder. The same name had appeared in the boundary description of the Edward Heath sale to John French of 13 March 1705, where the messuage house and 7.5 acres were bounded by Ripon Wells, John Alexander and Thomas Burnham. The two records together establish Beurnham as a substantial holder with property in multiple parts of the island, and the consistency of his appearance in boundary descriptions across different deeds confirms his settled position within the planter community. Simon Whaley appears here as the second boundary holder at the head of Fishery Valley. The Whaley name had earlier appeared in the records as Pomon Whaley, witness to the Pratt to Casthope sale of 13 July 1687. The Simon Whaley named here is probably a different member of the same family, and the appearance of two distinct Whaleys across a span of more than twenty years confirms the family's continuing presence on the island. Speculations The smaller financial provision for Susanna compared to Elizabeth, with only £5 0s 0d in cash against Elizabeth's £11 0s 0d plus £6 0s 0d, suggests that the executors were distributing the estate's resources differently between the daughters. The compensating provision of a slave's services for the term and the cow and calf may have made the total value of Susanna's placement broadly equivalent to Elizabeth's, but in a form that reflected the working capital of a free planter household rather than the urban household of a soldier with property holdings. The structure shows the executors tailoring each placement to the receiving household's economic profile. The selection of Robert Leech as the master for Susanna places her in a household that had been actively involved in the Carne family's dealings. Robert Leech had sold fifteen acres at the head of Fryer Valley to George Carne through Mary Carne acting as attorney on 4 January 1705 for £25 0s 0d, with the land described as the orphans' portion of the late Mary Dixon. Leech's experience with handling property associated with orphans' portions may have made him a natural choice for the executors when placing Susanna under a similar arrangement. The decision to seal the Toster to Jeffrey deed with a £30 0s 0d deferred component secured by a separate obligation suggests Jeffrey expected income or credit to reach him within the eleven months before the payment fell due. The £50 0s 0d paid at sealing represented a substantial commitment, and the additional £30 0s 0d was sufficient to push the total close to a year's worth of typical planter income. The mechanism may have reflected Jeffrey's confidence in his future receipts or his preference for spreading the cash outlay across two distinct dates rather than committing the full sum at once. |

The land had formerly belonged to the late Edward Heath, free planter, and had passed to Toster under Heath's will. Jeffrey and his heirs took the parcel for ever, to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. Toster covenanted that Jeffrey and his successors would peacefully and quietly possess and enjoy the land without disturbance from him, his heirs or any person acting through him. He confirmed the bargain for ever                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |

Thomas Toster signed by his mark in the form of a cross. A separate writing was made on 14 April 1709 between Thomas Toster, soldier in the Company's service, with the consent of his wife Mary Toster, and William Hartwell, soldier of the island. Toster sold to Hartwell a dwelling house with a back kitchen and all the ground belonging to it. The house had formerly belonged to Thomas Earle, free planter of the island. The price was £26 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand. Toster acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. Hartwell and his heirs took the house, back kitchen and ground for ever, to their own proper use and behoof. Toster covenanted that Hartwell and his successors would enjoy the property without molestation, interruption or contradiction from him or any person acting through him, and bound himself to save Hartwell harmless from any claim. The deed was sealed and delivered in the presence of Ripon Wells and John Welch. Thomas Toster signed by his mark in the form of a cross. Mary Toster set her hand and seal to the deed alongside her husband. Interpretations The recital in the Toster to Jeffrey deed that the twenty-two acres had formerly belonged to the late Edward Heath, and had passed to Toster under Heath's will, opens a new line in the chain of Heath's estate. Heath had been an active land trader during his lifetime, acquiring the Peak Gult parcel by exchange with the Company and selling it to Hoskison on 11 May 1704, buying the messuage house and 7.5 acres and selling them to John French on 13 March 1705, taking on Toster's earlier Sandy Bay leasehold and assigning it to Paul Charles on the same date, and acquiring the Fisher Valley parcel through the chain of assignments running from Coole to Brayne in 1688 and 1702. The current deed shows Toster as a beneficiary under Heath's will, taking the twenty-two acres at the head of Fishery Valley as a legacy and selling it on for £80 0s 0d. The earlier Heath to Charles deed of 13 March 1705, in which Heath assigned the unexpired term of a 21-year Company lease originally granted to John Toster, soldier, on 7 March 1694, establishes the link between the two Tosters. John Toster had been the original lessee of the Sandy Bay parcel, and the Thomas Toster of the 1709 deeds is probably either the same man or a relative. The pattern suggests a continuing connection between the Toster and Heath households across at least fifteen years, with Heath acquiring leasehold interests from John Toster and bequeathing freehold interests to Thomas Toster. The Toster to Hartwell sale of 14 April 1709 documents a transaction between two members of the garrison. Both men are identified as soldiers, with Toster acting in the Company's service. The £26 0s 0d price for the dwelling house with back kitchen and ground sits at the lower end of the urban market and matches the pattern established by the smaller Chapel Valley properties, where ordinary dwelling houses changed hands at prices in the £20 0s 0d to £30 0s 0d range. The recital that the house had formerly belonged to Thomas Earle, free planter, gives a previous owner in the chain of title. Earle does not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed so far, and his appearance here as the named predecessor of Toster places him as one of the earlier urban property holders whose name persisted in the boundary descriptions and conveyances after his |

The pattern of identifying property by reference to a previous holder is standard practice in the records and serves to fix the property in the urban geography. Mary Toster's appearance as a co-signatory of the deed, alongside her husband Thomas, brings a married woman directly into an urban conveyance for the second recorded time. The Bradley sale of 18 October 1705 had recorded both Arthur and Sarah Bradley as parties, and the joint conveyance by William and Mary French to Edward Bagley of 4 March 1708 had similarly involved both spouses. The Mary Toster signature here follows the pattern and shows that joint sealing by married couples was an established practice in the records, particularly where the wife's interest in the property required express extinguishment. The two Toster sales of 12 April 1709 and 14 April 1709, completed within two days of each other, suggest Toster was settling several outstanding matters at once. The £80 0s 0d received from Jeffrey for the Fishery Valley land, combined with the £26 0s 0d received from Hartwell for the Chapel Valley dwelling house, gave him £106 0s 0d in total. The two transactions together represent a substantial disposal of property within a single week, and the structure points to Toster either preparing to leave the island or rebalancing his estate after the inheritance from Heath. The dating convention of the Toster deeds, with the day of the month given first and the year written out in full, follows the standard formula of the records. The use of John Alexander as the witness to the 12 April Jeffrey deed, alongside Thomas Free, confirms Alexander's continuing role as the principal register of property transactions in the late 1700s. The choice of Ripon Wells as the witness to the 14 April Hartwell deed extends Wells's appearances in the records, after his earlier acquisitions from James Casthope in March 1694 and from Michael Morris in October 1701. Edward Heath's death by April 1709 represents the closing of an active career in the records. Heath had been a substantial trader, witness and intermediary across the period from 1702 to 1707, and his will distributed property to Toster and presumably to other beneficiaries. The fact that the twenty-two acres at Fishery Valley passed to Toster, alongside any other dispositions made by the will, suggests Heath had cultivated specific personal relationships during his lifetime that determined the structure of his testamentary settlement. Speculations The closeness in date between the Toster to Jeffrey sale of 12 April 1709 and the Toster to Hartwell sale of 14 April 1709 suggests that Toster was acting under pressure of an imminent departure from the island. A soldier in the Company's service whose duties might call him away on short notice would have had a strong incentive to convert his property holdings into portable cash before leaving, and the staging of two major sales within forty-eight hours fits the pattern of a man clearing his affairs in preparation for embarkation. The choice to sell the Fishery Valley land to Samuel Jeffrey on a deferred payment basis, with £50 0s 0d paid at sealing and £30 0s 0d secured for 29 February following, gave Toster less than the full £80 0s 0d in immediate cash but did not delay the sale itself. Toster's apparent need to dispose of the property quickly may have outweighed his preference for full payment in hand, with the £30 0s 0d obligation under hand and seal providing sufficient security against the deferred portion. The 29 February date, falling almost a year after the sale, suggests Toster expected to be in a position to enforce the obligation from wherever he might be at that point. |

The express extinguishment of her interest by her own sealing gave Hartwell complete protection against any future claim she might make as a widow or in her own right, and the procedural care taken in the deed indicates Toster's awareness that his absence from the island after the sale would leave Mary as the sole party present to assert any continuing claim. The structure therefore looks like part of the same departure preparation that the rapid sequence of sales suggests.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

The sale included all appurtenances belonging to the property. The price was £50 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Goodwin acknowledged the sum as received. The house had formerly belonged to Thomas and Prudence Sherwin, with the earlier transaction recorded on folio 51 of the island's registry book. Francis and his heirs took the house and appurtenances for ever, to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. Goodwin covenanted that Francis and his successors would peacefully and quietly possess and enjoy the property without any interruption, claim or demand from him, his heirs, executors, administrators or any person acting through him. The deed was made on 4 May 1709 and sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of William Marsden, Gilbert Cotgrave and Joseph Tomlinson. Thomas Goodwin set his hand and seal to it. A separate indenture was made on 11 August 1709 between John French, gunner of the island, and Thomas Burnham, free planter of the island. French placed and bound Susannah Audouart as an apprentice with Burnham. She was to dwell with him for a term of seven years from the date of the indenture. Burnham bound himself and his heirs to teach Susannah, or to cause her to be taught, the following: To read and to work with her needle together with the Church catechism and other things suitable for a good housewife All manner of household business fitting and becoming a good housewife During the term Burnham was to provide her with the following: Sufficient provisions meat, drink, apparel, washing and lodging Interpretations The Goodwin to Francis sale of 4 May 1709 documents the onward transfer of a property that had appeared earlier in the records as the Sherwin tenement. The 2 July 1694 sale by Prudence Sherwin to Thomas Goodwin, acting under her husband Thomas Sherwin's letter of attorney, had moved the house to Goodwin for £26 0s 0d in island currency. The Fort James Valley location and the reference back to folio 51 of the registry book confirm that the current deed concerns the same property. The sale price of £50 0s 0d nearly doubles the £26 0s 0d that Goodwin had paid fifteen years earlier, and the figure reflects a steady appreciation of urban property over the period. Goodwin's identification in the May 1709 deed as deputy governor presents a chronological question. His earlier appearances had described him as governor by 16 December 1707, and the council session on 18 December 1707 of the register-recopying attestation |

|                    |                 | finde and allow her Said Apprentice Sufficient Meate Drink and apparrell, Washing and Lodging, And the Aforesaid Susannah Audowart, Shall the Said Thomas Beurnham | had treated him as governor by that date. The 8 June 1708 Dweight transactions, the 22 June 1708 Bevia sale and the August 1708 Dufton executors' deeds had all identified him as governor. The May 1709 description of him as deputy governor therefore suggests either a transitional period in which the title fluctuated, or a return to the deputy position after a period of higher office. Without further evidence the description is recorded as it appears in the deed. The continuing pattern of Goodwin acquiring property and then selling it on at a substantial profit is visible across many of the records. The 1694 purchase from Prudence Sherwin for £26 0s 0d and the 1709 sale to Henry Francis for £50 0s 0d represent a nearly two-fold increase over fifteen years, which works out at roughly five per cent compound appreciation per annum. The pattern is consistent across his other recorded sales and indicates a careful management of the timing of disposals against the trajectory of the urban market. Henry Francis's purchase of the former Sherwin tenement from Goodwin extends the recorded Francis dealings. His earlier appearance as son-in-law of Edward Edmunds, his quit-claim to Goodwin regarding the Chapel Valley house in 1704, and his role as witness to multiple substantial transactions place him firmly within the Chapel Valley network. The May 1709 acquisition adds an established urban property to his recorded holdings and shows him moving from witness and beneficiary into the position of a principal urban property owner. The reference to Benjamin Sich as a neighbouring holder, alongside Richard Gurling, introduces a name that had earlier appeared in the December 1707 Powell to Sich arrangement regarding the disputed Beale parcel. The Sich named there was James Sich, and the Benjamin Sich here is presumably a different member of the same family. The Sich name had also appeared in the earlier records connected with the Sech family of the Swallow inheritance settlement of February 1705. The varied spellings of Sech, Sich and the related forms across the records reflect the uncertainty in the recording of the family name rather than distinct families. The Susannah Audouart apprenticeship of 11 August 1709 documents a third indenture of the same kind. Susannah is placed with Thomas Burnham for a term of seven years, but the recital does not specify her age at the time, the source of the placement decision (since John French rather than executors places her), or the financial structure of the arrangement. The visible portion of the deed gives the educational and material obligations on Burnham in terms identical to those in the Doveton apprenticeships of August 1707 and March 1708, but without the cash, livestock or slave provisions that those earlier indentures had included. John French's appearance as the placing party for Susannah Audouart, in his capacity as gunner of the island, raises a question about his relationship to the child. He had earlier acquired the messuage house and 7.5 acres from Edward Heath on 13 March 1705 for £50 0s 0d in his capacity as chief gunner of Fort James, and had sold the Chapel Valley plot to William Dufton on 12 March 1705 for £7 0s 0d. The current role as placer of an apprentice would normally be filled by a parent or executor, and his appearance in that role for Susannah Audouart suggests either a familial connection between French and the Audouart household or a more formal position as guardian or trustee of the child. The Audouart family had earlier appeared in the records through Sutton Isaack's gift of one acre to his grandson Stephen Audouart, son of Bartrant Audouart, the Company's smith, on 29 October 1698. The Susannah Audouart of August 1709 is probably a |

The fact that French rather than Bartrant Audouart places the child suggests Bartrant may have died by August 1709, leaving the family's affairs to be managed by someone else within the Company's establishment. Speculations Goodwin's decision to sell the Sherwin tenement to Henry Francis in May 1709 may have been part of a wider reorganisation of his property holdings as he approached the end of his active career. The 1694 purchase had brought the property into his hands while he was still working as a junior member of the garrison, and the May 1709 sale would have released the urban property at a point when his country estate and his official position no longer required this particular holding. The sale to Francis, who had family connections through Edmunds and through his own marriage to the Wrangham widow, may have been part of consolidating the property within an established Chapel Valley family rather than seeking the highest open-market price. The placement of Susannah Audouart with Thomas Burnham for a seven-year term, rather than until majority or marriage as in the Doveton indentures, points to a particular structure of provision. Seven years was the standard English apprenticeship term, and its use here suggests the parties were applying a formal model rather than tailoring the arrangement to the child's particular age or expected future. The contrast with the Doveton indentures, which ran to majority or marriage, may reflect a difference in Susannah's age, in the resources available for her placement, or in the parties' assumptions about what the apprenticeship was meant to achieve. John French's involvement as placer of the apprentice, rather than as paying executor under a will, indicates that the Audouart placement was not directly funded from an estate in the way the Doveton placements had been. The visible portion of the deed records no cash, livestock or slave consideration moving from French to Burnham, which suggests either that the financial terms appeared later in the document or that the arrangement operated on a different basis. The pattern raises the possibility that Burnham was taking Susannah on as a working apprentice whose labour over seven years would be the primary consideration on his side. |

It was sealed in the presence of J Blackmore, governor, Robert Holden, deputy governor, Gregory Field, third of council, and J Blackmore junior, register. A separate memorandum recorded a sale by John Bagley, free planter of St Helena, to Andrew Wilson, free planter of the island. Bagley sold to Wilson a tenement house in Chapel Valley adjoining the house of Israel Hayles, formerly William Crooes's, and the house of Katherine Saury. The price was £25 0s 0d, paid in hand in yams. Wilson and his heirs took the house with all appurtenances, free from any disturbance or molestation by Bagley, his heirs, executors or administrators. The deed was made on 7 February 1696 and sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of Joseph Worrall and John Alexander. John Bagley set his hand and seal to it. Interpretations The Audouart apprenticeship indenture closes with the obligation on Burnham to provide Susannah with a new suit of apparel at the end of the seven-year term. The provision recognises that a young woman emerging from such a placement would need fresh clothing to mark her transition to her next stage of life, whether returning to her family, marrying or entering employment. The standard inclusion of this clothing payment in early-modern apprenticeship indentures shows the institutional structure of the apprenticeship continuing to operate on the island in the same form as in England. The signing of the indenture by Morris Griffin, alongside the established figure of Sutton Isaack senior, brings another name from the Audouart family circle into the documentary record. Sutton Isaack had been the grandfather who made the 29 October 1698 gift of one acre to Stephen Audouart, and his witnessing of Susannah's indenture eleven years later confirms his continuing involvement in the affairs of the Audouart household. The pattern suggests that the Audouart children were being placed and provided for through a network of family connections rather than through commercial arrangements. The Company's grant to Andrew Wilson of 16 August 1684 introduces an early original grant to the records of this set. The grant was made under the Company's common seal at the Fort by Governor J Blackmore, Deputy Governor Robert Holden, Gregory Field of council and J Blackmore junior as register. The signatories match those of the same date's grant to Owen Bevan of twenty acres recorded earlier in this material, and the two grants together appear to be part of a single session of Company land business on 16 August 1684. The boundary description of the Wilson grant places his twenty acres adjoining the former John Cleverlee allotment to the east, James Wakefield's ten acres to the west, Orlando Bagley's ten acres to the north and the Company's common ground to the south. The reference to John Cleverlee as the late former holder confirms that his Sandy Bay dealings of the 1682 inquest had ended by August 1684 with his death, since the 1682 inquest had still recorded him as an active broker assembling the John Long allotment through purchase and exchange. The interval between the inquest and the Wilson grant therefore covers the closing of Cleverlee's career on the island. |

|                    |                 |                   | The Bagley to Wilson sale of 7 February 1696 records a Chapel Valley tenement transfer with the £25 0s 0d price paid entirely in yams. The use of yams as the sole medium of payment is unusual within the records, where most transactions used a combination of cash, sterling, store credit or livestock. The yam payment confirms the central role of the crop in the island's economy and shows that, by 1696, a substantial urban tenement could be purchased for an equivalent quantity of yams alone. The mechanism reflects the planter community's ability to settle property transactions through their primary agricultural produce. The boundary description of the Bagley to Wilson sale names Israel Hayles, whose house had formerly belonged to William Crooes, and Katherine Saury as the adjoining holders. Israel Hayles had earlier appeared as a witness to the Trapp to Goodwin sale of 10 February 1690, and the reference to him here as the neighbouring holder confirms his continuing presence in Chapel Valley six years later. The William Crooes named as Hayles's predecessor and Katherine Saury as the second neighbour do not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed so far, and their presence here preserves their place in the urban network for that period. The two Wilson transactions of 1684 and 1696 chart his trajectory from initial Company grantee to substantial urban property holder over a twelve-year period. The 1684 grant gave him twenty acres of upland adjoining Bagley, Wakefield and the former Cleverlee parcel, and the 1696 purchase added a Chapel Valley tenement in the heart of the urban core. The combination of rural land and urban property places Wilson within the typical pattern of an established free planter, with holdings spread between the working country estate and the residential heart of the island. John Bagley's sale of the urban tenement to Wilson in February 1696 represents one of his recorded disposals. The Bagley family had multiple branches across the records, with Edward Bagley emerging as a major Lemon Valley figure, Orlando Bagley senior and junior holding at the head of Chapel Valley, John Bagley appearing in earlier witness roles, and the John Bagley to Walkborne mortgage of 20 July 1708. The current John Bagley sale to Andrew Wilson predates the Walkborne mortgage by twelve years and shows the family's continuous involvement in property transactions across more than a decade. Speculations The decision to pay the £25 0s 0d entirely in yams suggests Andrew Wilson had a substantial surplus of the crop at the time of the purchase. The value of yams as a settlement medium would have varied with the supply, and a buyer paying in yams was effectively converting agricultural surplus into urban property without first needing to convert it into cash. The arrangement worked to Wilson's advantage by avoiding the loss involved in selling yams for cash and then using the cash to buy property, and it worked to Bagley's advantage by giving him a usable supply of provisions that could be consumed, traded or used as currency in further transactions. The matching of the Company's grants to Owen Bevan and Andrew Wilson on the same day, 16 August 1684, points to a session of Company land business in which multiple new allotments were processed simultaneously. The Company would have used such sessions to clear outstanding grants, to allocate land to deserving free planters and to formalise arrangements that had been pending. The choice of Wilson and Bevan as grantees on the same day may reflect their similar standing within the planter community or the convenience of processing related grants together. The seven-year term of Susannah Audouart's apprenticeship, distinct from the Doveton placements |

If she was around twelve or thirteen at the start of the term, the apprenticeship would end when she was nineteen or twenty, by which point she would be expected to leave Burnham's household either for marriage or to enter another setting. The seven-year structure therefore aligns the term with her likely life stage rather than with an arbitrary end-point.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

The land formed part of the twenty acres of lot land that had been held by the late Andrew Wilson and lay in Sandy Bay. The mortgage included the weir on the land, all the fruits then growing on it and the following further property: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>A dwelling house in Fort James Valley together with all appurtenances</li> <li>A second house on the eighteen-acre parcel together with all appurtenances</li> <li>All goods and chattels then in Joseph and Martha Fox's possession belonging and appurtenant to the children of the late Thomas Earle, Martha Fox's former husband</li> </ul> The mortgage was secured against the principal sum of £32 0s 0d in good current money, already received by the Foxes from Steward and Bagley. The Foxes' interest in the property was held during Martha Fox's natural life, without any claim, challenge or demand from any other person. The deed was made on 18 August 1709 and signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Joshua Johnson and Henry Webley. Joseph Fox and Martha Fox each set their hands and seals to it. A separate bill of sale was made by William Hartwell, soldier of the island, with his wife Sarah, to Thomas Toster, soldier of the island. Hartwell sold to Toster ten acres of land at the head of Fishers Valley with all appurtenances and provisions belonging to it. The price was £25 0s 0d in good current money of the island. Hartwell delivered to Toster all the right and title he could claim in the land. He bound himself, his heirs and assigns never to disturb Toster, his heirs or assigns in their possession. The deed was made on 29 January 1710 and witnessed by John Jeffrey, who signed by his mark in the form of the figure 4. William Hartwell and Sarah Hartwell each set their hands and seals to it. Interpretations The Fox to Steward and Bagley mortgage of 18 August 1709 documents a complex composite security combining rural land, urban property, growing crops and movable goods. The eighteen acres in Sandy Bay had been carved out of the twenty acres originally granted to Andrew Wilson by the Company on 16 August 1684. The reduction of two acres between the original grant and the present mortgage suggests that part of the Wilson land had been alienated separately before passing to the Fox household, or that the original grant boundaries had been reassessed at some point. The recital that the goods and chattels belonged and appertained to the children of the late Thomas Earle introduces the operative limitation on the security. Martha Fox had been previously married to Thomas Earle, the same man whose former Chapel Valley dwelling house had been sold by Toster to William Hartwell on 14 April 1709. The mortgaged movable property belonged not to Martha and Joseph Fox but to Martha's children by Earle. The Foxes' right to the |

Martha Fox had remarried after Earle's death, and her new husband Joseph Fox was using property that the children of the first marriage held as a beneficial interest. The mortgage explicitly acknowledges that the goods and chattels belonged to the Earle children, with the Foxes' enjoyment limited to Martha's lifetime. The mechanism prevented the new husband from disposing of the children's property and preserved their reversionary claim. The decision to take Steward and Bagley as joint mortgagees rather than a single lender suggests that the £32 0s 0d advance was too substantial for either man to commit alone. The joint structure also gave the Foxes a deeper pool of creditworthiness, since both Steward and Bagley would be jointly responsible for the principal. The arrangement parallels the joint marital conveyances seen elsewhere in the records, but here applied to lenders rather than sellers, and shows the practice of partnership extending into the credit side of property transactions. The reference to the weir on the Sandy Bay parcel introduces a specific water-management feature. A weir would have been built to control or divert a watercourse, perhaps to power a small mill, to channel water to the plantation or to manage drainage from the upper slopes. The inclusion of the weir in the mortgaged property indicates that the Sandy Bay parcel was equipped with a working hydraulic installation that added significantly to its value. The Hoskison estate at the Little Horse Pasture had included a similar level of improvement, and the weir suggests the Fox parcel was a developed working unit rather than bare land. The Hartwell to Toster sale of 29 January 1710 closes the loop on the property dealings between the two men. Toster had sold the Chapel Valley dwelling house to Hartwell on 14 April 1709 for £26 0s 0d, and Hartwell now sells back ten acres at the head of Fishers Valley to Toster for £25 0s 0d. The matching figures suggest a balanced exchange of properties between the two soldiers, with each man taking the type of property better suited to his circumstances. The exchange may have been part of a coordinated rearrangement of their holdings after Toster's earlier sales. The earlier Toster sale of 12 April 1709 had moved twenty-two acres at the head of Fishery Valley to Samuel Jeffrey for £80 0s 0d. The current January 1710 acquisition of ten acres at the head of Fishers Valley from Hartwell brings part of Toster's holdings back into the area, though for a parcel less than half the size of the one sold. The pattern suggests Toster was reorganising rather than departing from the island, with the disposals of April 1709 followed by selective reacquisitions less than a year later. Sarah Hartwell's joint sealing of the bill of sale, alongside her husband William, brings a married couple again into a conveyance through joint execution. The pattern continues the practice seen in the Bradley, French, Toster and Fox transactions, and confirms that joint marital sealing was a settled feature of the records by 1710. The express extinguishment of the wife's interest through her own seal gave the buyer protection against any later widow's claim. The witness John Jeffrey of the Hartwell to Toster deed is probably a relative of the Samuel Jeffrey who had bought the twenty-two acres from Toster on 12 April 1709. The Jeffrey family's continuing involvement in transactions concerning Fisher Valley land suggests they were holders or witnesses to multiple adjacent |

The £32 0s 0d principal would have been substantial enough to address a particular debt, settlement or investment, while the property remained available to revert to the Foxes on repayment. The use of a mortgage rather than an outright sale, particularly given the existence of the Earle children's claims, gave the family the flexibility to clear the obligation without permanently alienating land or movable property that included their children's interests. The limitation of the security to Martha Fox's natural life, with the Earle children's interest reverting on her death, places the mortgagees in a precarious position. Steward and Bagley could enforce against the property only during Martha's lifetime, and if she died before they had been fully repaid, the Earle children's claim would extinguish their security in the goods and chattels. The structure suggests that Steward and Bagley were prepared to take this risk in exchange for the modest principal, perhaps because they expected repayment within Martha's expected remaining years. The matching prices of the Toster-Hartwell exchange, with £26 0s 0d for the Chapel Valley dwelling house and £25 0s 0d for the ten acres at the head of Fishers Valley, suggest a substantive trade rather than two independent transactions. The £1 0s 0d difference favours the rural land slightly over the urban property, but the closeness of the figures indicates that both parties had agreed in advance on a near-equal exchange of value. The structure points to a deliberate swap by which Toster moved out of urban property and into rural land, and Hartwell moved out of rural land and into urban property, with the small cash differential settling the balance. |

John French set his hand and seal to it. A note appended to the memorandum recorded that the original lease of the land was registered in the same book at folios 34 and 35. Interpretations The Marsden to Toster sale of 6 March 1711 completes the chain of ownership of the Fort James Valley house that William Marsden himself had acquired from George Dweight on 12 April 1709. The earlier deed had recorded the same property passing from the late Thomas Harper through William Marsh to Dweight, and the current sale adds Marsden as the fourth recorded holder and Toster as the fifth. The £32 0s 0d price represents a £12 0s 0d increase over the £20 0s 0d Marsden had paid Dweight just under two years earlier, indicating a substantial appreciation in the interval or a particular advantage that Toster was prepared to pay for. The recital of the full chain of ownership through four named holders is characteristic of urban Fort James Valley deeds and contrasts with the simpler recitations of rural conveyances. The pattern reflects the rapid turnover of small dwelling houses in the urban core, with each successive owner adding their name to a documented sequence. The detail in the recital probably served to give Toster confidence in his title by demonstrating that each transfer had been formally recorded. Toster's acquisition of the Marsden house on 6 March 1711 fits within the pattern of his property rearrangement during 1709 and 1710. He had sold the Chapel Valley dwelling house to William Hartwell on 14 April 1709 for £26 0s 0d, sold twenty-two acres at the head of Fishery Valley to Samuel Jeffrey on 12 April 1709 for £80 0s 0d, and bought ten acres at the head of Fishers Valley from Hartwell on 29 January 1710 for £25 0s 0d. The current acquisition of the Fort James Valley dwelling house for £32 0s 0d adds an urban property to his rural holdings and shows him systematically rebuilding a balanced estate after his earlier disposals. The naming of Dorothy Hayre, widow, as the neighbouring holder shows a continuing presence of widows holding property in their own right in the Fort James Valley area. The Hayre or Hayes family name had appeared earlier in the records as Mrs Hays, named as the neighbour to George Dweight's Chapel Valley tenement bought from William Marsh on 8 June 1708. The continued reference to a widow named Hayre or Hayes as the neighbouring holder confirms her established position within the urban property network. The French to Burnham assignment of 26 September 1707 is unusual in being entered in the records at this point, alongside the substantive transactions of 1709, 1710 and 1711. The chronological misplacement reflects the practice of recording assignments in the register at the time of their entry rather than at the date of their execution, with the register itself serving as the authoritative chronological record. The reference to folios 34 and 35 for the original lease shows the record-keeping system maintaining cross-references between related entries. The £80 0s 6d consideration for the French assignment is the only recorded transaction in the records with such a precisely calibrated odd sixpence component. The figure suggests a specific calculation rather than a rounded negotiation, perhaps reflecting the precise value of crops, livestock or improvements being assigned alongside the lease itself. The structure shows the planter community's ability to express valuations at a high level of precision when the parties had a particular reason to do so. |

The acquisition of the lease and premises from French in September 1707 had given him agricultural land or buildings nearly two years before he took on the apprentice, and the pattern suggests Burnham was building a substantial working household across multiple recorded transactions. The note recording the registry of the original lease at folios 34 and 35 of the same book provides a glimpse of the documentary system in operation. The cross-reference let readers locate the underlying instrument in its original form rather than relying on the present assignment alone. The system suggests an active and well-maintained register in which the relationships between deeds could be traced through specific folio numbers, and the practice probably reflects John Alexander's continuing work as register from at least 1686. Speculations The £12 0s 0d appreciation between Marsden's purchase of the Fort James Valley house from Dweight in April 1709 and his sale to Toster in March 1711, against the modest £5 0s 0d appreciation seen in the Hemon-Alexander-Dweight chain over six years, suggests Marsden was either passing on a parcel he had improved during his ownership or extracting a profit margin from a particularly favourable market moment. The contrast with the slower appreciation in other urban properties points to either active improvement or a particular set of circumstances driving the higher price. Toster's continuing rebuilding of his portfolio through the Marsden acquisition, after his earlier April 1709 disposals of much larger holdings, suggests he had decided to remain on the island rather than to depart. The pattern of substantial 1709 sales followed by selective 1710 and 1711 reacquisitions shows a planter rearranging the balance and location of his estate rather than liquidating it altogether. The Fort James Valley dwelling house gave him a small urban base, while the Fishers Valley parcel provided continuing agricultural ground, and the two together formed a viable working estate at a smaller scale than his earlier holdings. The French to Burnham assignment of September 1707, entered in the register only alongside the substantive transactions of 1709, 1710 and 1711, suggests the assignment had been kept outside the formal record for some period before being submitted for entry. The reason for the delay is not clear, and the parties may have operated under the assignment privately for some time before deciding to register it. The pattern would be consistent with arrangements that the parties only later sought to formalise, perhaps because of a developing need to clarify title or because of a change in the parties' circumstances that made formal registration desirable. |

He assigned and made over to Orlando Bagley, free planter of the island, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, all his right, title and interest in the ten-acre lease. The assignment was delivered in the presence of Thomas Coules, who signed by his mark, and Richard Swallow. Tovey acknowledged the receipt of the consideration made by Bagley for his right to the lease of twenty-six acres of land, which Tovey made over to Bagley. Bagley was to pay all charges associated with the lease. The note was witnessed by Richard Swallow and Jonathan Doveton. It was signed Yours, Joseph Pannele Servant, and dated A Tovey. John Alexander certified it as a true copy. Interpretations The Company lease to John Orchard of 10 April 1703 sets a notably low annual rent for the ten acres at Peter Bagley's. The annual rent of seven shillings on a ninety-nine-year term gave Orchard control of the land for less than the cost of a few weeks' provisions at recorded island prices. The figure compares favourably with the Paul Charles ninety-nine-year Sandy Bay lease at forty shillings annually granted in March 1705, which suggests that the Peter Bagley land was either of lower agricultural value or was being released by the Company on particularly favourable terms to encourage development of a marginal area. The location of the ten acres at Peter Bagley's, bounded on all four sides by the Company's waste land, identifies the parcel as an island of leasehold within a continuous block of unallotted Company ground. The pattern matches the Richard Swallow purchase from Thomas Cole on 5 June 1705, where the seventeen acres at the head of Deep Valley were also bounded on all sides by Company waste land. Such isolated holdings within Company territory required particular justification, and the Company's willingness to lease them out on long terms suggests an institutional interest in seeing the land worked rather than left idle. The naming of the land as Peter Bagleys introduces a further Bagley reference to the records. The proliferation of Bagley names across the documents includes Edward Bagley at the head of Lemon Valley, Orlando Bagley senior and junior at the head of Chapel Valley, John Bagley as principal in earlier transactions and as the borrower from Walkborne, and now Peter Bagley as the holder or namesake of a particular parcel. The family had clearly become numerous enough on the island for individual parcels to be identified by reference to specific members. The Orchard to Bagley assignment of 26 September 1711 transfers the ninety-nine-year leasehold from the original Company lessee to Orlando Bagley. The eight-year interval between Orchard's grant in 1703 and his assignment in 1711 left him with roughly ninety years remaining on the term, which Bagley acquired at whatever value the parties agreed but which is not specified in the visible portion of the deed. The structure shows the Company's long leases functioning as transferable interests within the planter community, with the leases changing hands by assignment rather than by fresh grants. The Tovey to Bagley note of 14 June 1713 documents a further assignment to Orlando Bagley, this |

The note is unusually informal in its drafting, lacking the standard recitals of consideration and the express bargaining language of the conveyances. The structure suggests it was prepared as a receipt or memorandum rather than as a full conveyance, with the substantive transfer effected by the underlying agreement and the note serving to confirm payment and the passage of title. The undertaking by Orlando Bagley to pay all charges associated with the twenty-six-acre lease is the operative feature of the Tovey arrangement. The phrase suggests that the lease carried outstanding obligations to the Company or to other parties that Tovey was passing on, and Bagley was assuming responsibility for clearing those obligations as part of the consideration. The mechanism let Tovey extract the value of the lease in cash from Bagley while transferring its continuing burdens to the new assignee. The signature on the Tovey note as Joseph Pannele Servant, together with the dating as A Tovey, presents an apparent inconsistency that the document does not resolve. The combination may reflect Tovey acting through a servant or agent in the actual signing, or it may indicate that the document was prepared in a particular form unfamiliar to the writer of the record. The certification by John Alexander as a true copy suggests that the original document carried the same combination of names, with Pannele perhaps serving as Tovey's agent. Richard Swallow's appearance as a witness to both the Orchard assignment of September 1711 and the Tovey memorandum of June 1713 places him within Bagley's network of associates in the period. The Swallow name had earlier appeared in the records through the Sech family inheritance arrangements of February 1705 and the Thomas Swallow of the 1682 inquest, and the Richard Swallow named here is probably the younger man who had bought the Deep Valley mansion house from Thomas Cole in June 1705. His role as witness on multiple Bagley transactions indicates a continuing connection between the two households. Speculations The Company's decision to lease the Peter Bagley ten acres at the low rent of seven shillings per year reflects either the marginal quality of the land or a deliberate institutional policy of encouraging development of underused areas. The isolation of the parcel within continuous Company waste land would have made it less attractive than land adjoining other improved holdings, and the low rent may have been calibrated to make the lease viable for a planter prepared to work an isolated tract. The ninety-nine-year term gave the lessee enough time to recover any investment in clearing, fencing or planting the ground. Orlando Bagley's acquisition of two leasehold interests within a twenty-one-month period suggests a deliberate strategy of building up a leasehold portfolio. The Orchard assignment in September 1711 and the Tovey assignment in June 1713 added a combined thirty-six acres of leased land to his estate, none of it requiring substantial capital outlay since the leases came in already-paid form. The strategy let Bagley expand his working area significantly without committing the larger sums that freehold purchases would have demanded, and the long terms gave him the security to make the land productive over decades. The decision by Joseph Tovey to assign his twenty-six-acre lease to Bagley rather than to work it himself suggests Tovey had either acquired the lease for speculative purposes or had decided to withdraw from active planting. The cash consideration he received from Bagley would have given him liquidity for other purposes, while the assumption of charges by Bagley |

The price was £150 0s 0d in good current money of the island, paid in hand. Cleve acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. The chain of earlier ownership was recited in the deed: First holder the late Edward Bryan, as an old house Purchased by the late Henry Coales Held and rebuilt by Richard Cleve, who had enjoyed it for several years and had rebuilt it The house adjoined the house of John Long on one side and the house, or the remains of it, formerly belonging to the late Mr Henry Coales on the other side. Greentree and his heirs took the house and premises for ever. Cleve warranted the property against all manner of persons and undertook to defend the title for ever. The deed was made on 22 June 1715, in the first year of the reign of King George. It was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Matthew Bazett, John French and John Goodwin. Richard Cleve signed by his mark in the form of C. A separate writing was made by John Goodwin, freeholder of the island, to James Greentree, also a freeholder. Goodwin sold to Greentree four acres of land for £28 0s 0d in lawful money, paid in hand. Goodwin acknowledged the sum as received. The four acres formed part of ten acres formerly belonging to James Easthope of the island. The parcel lay near Lemon Valley land. Greentree and his heirs took the land with all appurtenances for the proper use and behoof of him and his successors. Interpretations The Cleve to Greentree sale of 22 June 1715 documents the highest recorded price for a single dwelling house in James Valley to this point in the records. The £150 0s 0d is well above the £20 0s 0d to £50 0s 0d range that had characterised the urban market through the earlier years, and the difference reflects the value added by the rebuilding of the house. The recital that Cleve had enjoyed the property for several years and had rebuilt it during his ownership shows the substantial physical investment that justified the price, with the rebuilding effectively converting an old structure into a new dwelling worth several times the value of the original. The chain of ownership recited in the deed, with Edward Bryan as the original holder, Henry Coales as the intermediate purchaser and Richard Cleve as the rebuilder, preserves the documentary history of the property across at least three generations of holders. |

|                    |                 | Island with all the appurtenances there- unto belonging Lying and being near Lemon Vally land To Have and To Hold the said bargained premises unto James Greentree His Heirs Executors Administrators &amp; Assigns to the only proper Use and behoof of him the Said James Greentree his Heirs Executors Administrators and assigns for Ever and J the said John Goodwin for my Self my Heirs Executors administrators and Assigns the said Bargained premises unto the said James Greentree his Heirs Execut[ors] administrators | The pattern of recital reflects the importance of demonstrating clear succession in a transaction of this size, and the inclusion of the rebuilding by Cleve as part of the recital establishes the source of the property's enhanced value as something Cleve himself had created during his tenure. The boundary description naming John Long as one neighbour and the remains of the late Henry Coales's house as the other places the rebuilt dwelling within a continuous line of urban property in James Valley. The reference to the Coales house as remains suggests that the neighbouring property had fallen into disrepair after Coales's death, and the contrast with Cleve's rebuilt house demonstrates how the urban core could see substantial variations in the physical condition of adjoining properties depending on the resources and commitment of successive holders. The first appearance of the dating by the reign of King George marks a transition in the records from the reigns covered by earlier deeds. King George I had succeeded Queen Anne on her death in August 1714, and the description of June 1715 as the first year of his reign establishes the continuing currency of regnal dating in the island registers. The transition shows the planter community's records keeping pace with developments in metropolitan succession, with John Alexander or his successors adjusting the dating formulas as needed. James Greentree's purchase of the rebuilt James Valley house for £150 0s 0d, combined with his earlier acquisitions of the Bevia house with life-interest reservation in October 1705, the Powell twenty acres at the head of Lemon Valley with the slave Oliver and the half-share in the still in March 1703, and now four acres from John Goodwin near Lemon Valley land in June 1715, confirms his position as a major property holder across multiple parts of the island. The pattern shows Greentree building a substantial estate over a period of more than a decade, with both urban and rural holdings reflecting his accumulated capital. The John Goodwin to Greentree sale of four acres for £28 0s 0d sets the price at £7 0s 0d per acre, which is at the upper end of the upland market established by earlier records. The figure compares with the £7 0s 0d per acre rate of the Hoskison to Powell sale of September 1706 and exceeds the £3 12s 0d per acre of the Toster to Jeffrey sale of April 1709. The premium probably reflects either the particular quality of the Lemon Valley land or a specific feature of the transaction between Goodwin and Greentree. The recital that the four acres formed part of ten acres formerly belonging to James Easthope connects the current sale to the earlier Easthope to Coole sale of 25 October 1687, where Easthope had sold ten acres at the head of Fisher Valley to John Coole for £8 0s 0d sterling. The chain of subsequent assignments had moved the property through Coole, Edward Brayne and Edward Heath. The current John Goodwin sale of four acres of land near Lemon Valley land described as formerly Easthope's suggests that either the property had moved further down the chain to Goodwin, or that the Easthope reference is to a different parcel from the one in the 1687 deed. John Goodwin's role here as the seller of the four acres is consistent with his earlier appearance as the principal in the Owen Bevia gift of 1 February 1690, the Trapp purchase of 10 February 1690 and the Greentree witness role on multiple occasions. The current sale shows Goodwin still active as a freeholder and able to dispose of part of an upland parcel for cash. His standing as son of Thomas Goodwin and as the named heir of the Bevia family settlement places him within the most established planter line on the island. |

The pattern of the two transactions taken together suggests a coordinated session in which Greentree expanded his holdings on the same day across two different properties, with Goodwin serving as a witness to one and as the principal in the other. Speculations The £150 0s 0d that Cleve received for the rebuilt James Valley house represents an extraordinary appreciation over the original old house that had belonged to Edward Bryan and then to Henry Coales. Without records of the price at which Coales had bought from Bryan or at which Cleve had acquired the property, the precise scale of the appreciation cannot be calculated, but the figure places the transaction in a different class from the £20 0s 0d to £50 0s 0d urban sales that had been standard in the earlier records. The premium reflects the value added by the rebuilding and shows the kind of return that substantial improvement could generate in the right market conditions. Cleve's identification as a soldier rather than as a free planter or freeholder distinguishes him from the established planter community. As a member of the garrison who had bought and rebuilt a substantial property, he occupies an unusual position within the records, where soldiers more commonly appear as buyers of smaller dwelling houses in the £20 0s 0d to £30 0s 0d range. The £150 0s 0d sale to Greentree suggests Cleve had accumulated substantial capital during his service, perhaps through trading activities alongside his soldiering, and the use of that capital to rebuild a house in James Valley shows him operating at a scale comparable to the wealthier free planters. James Greentree's expansion across multiple property categories over a twelve-year period suggests a household with continuous access to substantial funds. The earlier purchases from Powell in March 1703 for £86 0s 0d, from Bevan in October 1705 for £35 0s 0d and now from Cleve in June 1715 for £150 0s 0d represent a combined commitment of £271 0s 0d in cash for property acquisitions alone. The pattern points to Greentree either having a steady income from commercial activities, having inherited capital from an earlier generation, or having access to credit arrangements that let him commit to large transactions when opportunities arose. |

The deed was made on 26 September 1715 and signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Matthew Bazett, John French and Joseph Tomlinson. John Goodwin set his hand and seal to it. A separate writing was made by Richard Beale and Anthony Beale, both planters of St Helena and heirs of the late Jonathan Beale, planter, to the Honourable United East India Company. The brothers sold to the Company a parcel of land in the High Street in James Town, Chapel Valley, known as the half of Captain Beale's land at that place, with a house standing on it. The house adjoined the Company's storehouse. The price was £31 10s 0d, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. The brothers acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. The parcel was bounded as follows:                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

It was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Henry Rawlins, East Indiaman. Richard Beale and Anthony Beale each signed. Interpretations The John Goodwin to Greentree conveyance of 26 September 1715 closes the four-acre sale that had begun three months earlier on 22 June 1715. The interval between the body of the deed and the present completion suggests that the agreement had been entered into in June with the formal sealing delayed until September. The mechanism let the parties settle the substantive terms at an earlier date while delaying the final execution, perhaps to coincide with a particular session of witnesses or with the completion of related transactions. The Beale brothers' sale to the Company of 6 February 1716 documents the institutional acquisition of a substantial urban property in the heart of James Town. The price of £31 10s 0d for a house and land on the High Street, adjoining the Company's own storehouse, represents a strategic purchase that consolidated the Company's holdings in the immediate area of its operational core. The pattern matches the earlier Lufkin sale to the Company of 26 June 1707 for £350 0s 0d, in which the Company had acquired a thirty-acre estate adjoining its main pastureland, and shows the Company continuing to use direct purchase as a mechanism for expanding its institutional footprint. The identification of the property as the half of Captain Beale's land introduces a member of the Beale family with a military rank. The Captain Beale referred to in the deed is probably an earlier holder of the parcel before its division between Richard and Anthony Beale, and the rank suggests a connection to either the garrison or to East India Company shipping. The earlier records had mentioned Ellenor Beale, whose legacy descended through her daughter Ellenor Price and was administered by William Chevalls and George Carne in 1707, and the orphans of Jonathan Beale, whose Purslane Bed was named as a boundary feature in the Paul Graton Lemon Garden lease of 23 December 1707. The Captain Beale named here is probably a further member of the same family. The reference to Carne's Kitchen as the name of the northern neighbouring house owned by the Beale brothers introduces a place name with a clear connection to George Carne, the merchant. The naming of a building after Carne suggests that Carne had at some point occupied or owned the kitchen, perhaps as an outbuilding to a larger property, and the persistence of the name in the deed after the building had passed to the Beales reflects the standard practice of identifying urban properties by reference to a former owner or use. The boundary description of the parcel locates it precisely within the James Town street grid: the High Street to the east, the Great Run to the west, and the Beale brothers' other house to the north. The High Street identified here is the principal commercial thoroughfare of James Town, and the Great Run is the watercourse that ran through the valley to the sea. The juxtaposition of the High Street frontage with the Great Run boundary placed the parcel between the two principal physical features of the urban core, and the |

|              |              |                   | inclusion of the Company's storehouse as the adjoining property to the south reinforces the commercial significance of the location. The identification of Henry Rawlins as East Indiaman, rather than as a free planter, soldier or council member, places him within the category of Company servants or ship's officers temporarily on the island. East Indiamen were officers or crew of the Company's ships, present on the island during voyages between England and the Indies. The choice of an East Indiaman as the witness to a Company purchase, in addition to the principal Beale brothers' signatures, gave the transaction the attestation of a Company officer not based permanently on the island, and the structure suggests the deed was sealed during a period when a Company ship was in port. The provision in the deed that the Company took any right of party wall or walls then joining or that might thereafter join to the land addresses a particular feature of urban property in a densely built environment. Party walls were shared structures between adjoining buildings, and the rights and obligations of the neighbouring holders in those walls required express provision. The clause preserves the Company's continuing rights in any party walls that existed at the time of the sale or that might be built in the future, which was particularly relevant given the Company's ownership of the storehouse on the southern boundary. The signing of the deed at the Castle in James Valley locates the transaction at the principal seat of the Company's administration on the island. The Castle would have been the place where the governor, council and senior officers conducted Company business, and the choice of location for the sealing of the deed reflects the institutional significance of the transaction. The mechanism shows the Company conducting its property dealings at its administrative headquarters rather than at the location of the parcel itself, with the formal sealing taking place in the presence of the Company's senior personnel. Speculations The Beale brothers' sale of half of Captain Beale's land to the Company suggests they were realising the value of inherited property that they no longer wished to retain. As heirs of the late Jonathan Beale, Richard and Anthony Beale had received the property through inheritance, and the decision to sell to the Company rather than to another planter indicates that the Company was prepared to pay a price acceptable to the brothers. The mechanism let the heirs convert an inherited urban property into cash, while the Company gained a strategic location adjoining its own storehouse. The retention by the Beales of the other half of Captain Beale's land, with its house adjoining the parcel sold to the Company, points to a deliberate division of the inheritance rather than a complete liquidation. The brothers kept Carne's Kitchen and any associated buildings to the north, while selling the parcel to the south of it. The structure suggests the division was made along an existing physical boundary, perhaps the line between the two adjacent houses, with each parcel including the building standing on it. The mechanism let the brothers realise the value of one half while retaining the other for their own use or for further disposal at a later date. The Company's willingness to pay £31 10s 0d for the parcel, when ordinary urban dwelling houses without strategic significance had been selling in the £20 0s 0d to £50 0s 0d range, indicates that the value was set by the location and the proximity to the storehouse rather than by the intrinsic value of the building. The figure represents the Company's institutional valuation of a property whose worth lay in |

The parcel was known as the half of Captain Beale's land commonly called Carne's Kitchen. The price was £31 10s 0d, paid in hand by the Governor and council on behalf of the Honourable Company, the Lords Proprietors of the island. The Beale brothers acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. Other good causes and considerations were also recited as moving them. The parcel adjoined a house formerly belonging to Richard and Anthony Beale and then held by Mr Francis Carne. The Company, its successors and assigns took the house and land for ever, with all rights, profits and enjoyments that the Beales or their predecessors could have had. The Company also took any right of party wall or walls then joining or that might thereafter join to the land. The deed was made at Union Castle in James Valley on 9 February 1716. It was signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of George Rawlins and Thomas Hollivell, who signed by his mark. Richard Beale and Anthony Beale each signed. Philip Forsy registered the deed as a true copy. Three further notes were entered in the register, recording the existence of agreements held elsewhere: A document concerning George and Ann Hodgkinson indorsed as articles of agreement and registered in consultation book number 15 at folio 11 An agreement to maintain the children of the late Richard Alexander made by George Sanders with John Long on behalf of himself and the children of Captain Fassall and French, registered in consultation book number 15 at folio 80 A bond by John Robinson with sureties to pay the children of the late Onesipherus Sheado their portions, registered in consultation book number 15 at folios 39 and 40 Interpretations The second Beale brothers' sale to the Company of 9 February 1716, made three days after the sale of the southern half of Captain Beale's land, completes the disposal of the entire inherited parcel. The two sales together brought the Beales a combined £63 0s 0d in cash and gave the Company a continuous frontage in James Town adjoining its storehouse and the property of Mr Francis Carne. The structure shows the Company building a contiguous block of urban property through successive purchases from the same family within a single week. The matching price of £31 10s 0d for the second half, identical to the figure paid for the first, indicates that the Company had valued the two halves equally and the brothers had accepted symmetric terms for the related transactions. The mechanism may have been agreed at the outset, with both deeds prepared and sealed in close sequence to give the Company a complete title to Captain Beale's land in a single coordinated operation. The pricing suggests that the parcels were of broadly equivalent size and value, with neither half carrying a particular premium over the other. The reference to Mr Francis Carne as the holder of the adjoining house, formerly belonging to Richard and Anthony Beale, introduces a new generation of the Carne family into the records. George Carne, the |

The Francis Carne identified here is probably a son or nephew of George Carne, and his acquisition of a property formerly held by the Beale brothers suggests a continuing Carne family presence in James Town adjacent to the Beale holdings. The naming of the location as Union Castle in James Valley represents an evolution from the earlier reference to the Castle in James Valley in the 6 February 1716 deed. The two references both denote the same building, but the explicit naming as Union Castle in the second deed provides a fuller identification. The structure suggests that the Castle had acquired a formal name by this period, perhaps reflecting institutional naming conventions that became more established as the Company's presence on the island developed. Philip Forsy's appearance as the register of the deed marks a transition from John Alexander's long tenure in that role. Alexander had served as the register and clerk of the council from at least 1686, witnessing and certifying transactions across more than thirty years of the records. The current deed shows Forsy taking on the duty of registration, and the change reflects the natural turnover of the register's office over time. Alexander's continuing role through to the early years of George I's reign and the succession of Forsy as the certifying register indicate that the registry function remained continuous across the transition. The three notes recording agreements held in the consultation book number 15 introduce a category of records that the register has not previously highlighted in this set. The consultation book served as the record of the Governor and council's deliberations and decisions, and the cross-references to specific folios within that book give the location of substantive agreements that had not been entered in the deeds register itself. The mechanism shows the dual record-keeping system of the island, with property transactions in one book and consultation business in another, and cross-references maintaining the connection between the two. The first of the three notes concerns George and Ann Hodgkinson, whose articles of agreement are recorded as registered in the consultation book without further detail of their substance. The name Hodgkinson does not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed so far, and the reference here serves only to indicate the existence of the underlying agreement rather than its content. The pattern shows the registry system functioning as a finding aid for related documents stored elsewhere, with the brief notation in the deeds register pointing readers to the substantive entry in the consultation book. The second note records the agreement by which George Sanders undertook to maintain the children of the late Richard Alexander, made through John Long acting on behalf of himself and the children of Captain Fassall and French. The arrangement appears to be a multi-party undertaking to provide for the orphans of three different families: Alexander, Fassall and French. The mechanism mirrors the Doveton apprenticeships of 1707 and 1708 in placing responsibility for orphaned children with a specified household, but on a more institutional basis through the consultation book rather than through individual indentures. The third note records the bond by John Robinson with sureties to pay the children of the late Onesipherus Sheado their portions. The arrangement uses a bond rather than an agreement, which gave the children's interests a more secure legal foundation through the surety system. The mechanism shows the island administration ensuring that orphans received their |

The retention of either half without the other would have created practical difficulties of access, services and party walls, and the simultaneous sale of both halves to the same buyer avoided these complications. The mechanism let the brothers exit the inherited property completely, with the Company gaining a unified block that could be administered as a single asset. The appearance of Mr Francis Carne as a substantial James Town property holder by 1716, replacing the earlier role of George Carne in the records, suggests that the older generation of the Carne family had given way to the next. George Carne's earlier dealings had stretched back to 1704, and the appearance of Francis Carne in his place by 1716 indicates either George's death or his retirement from active property dealings. The Carne family's continuing presence in James Town shows the persistence of the household across generations, with the urban property remaining within the family even as the principal figure changed. The grouping of three different orphan-protection records as cross-references at the end of the Beale entries suggests that the register was being used as a comprehensive finding aid for all the major institutional arrangements concerning particular categories of beneficiaries. The orphans of Alexander, Fassall, French and Sheado are all named in the brief notations, and the pattern indicates an administrative practice of bringing together related records through cross-references within the deeds register. The mechanism would have helped a reader searching for protection arrangements for any specific orphan to locate the relevant substantive record in the consultation book. |

The members present were: John Roberts, esquire governor.Edward Walkborne deputy governor.William Marsden third in council.Daniel Griffeth fourth in council.Matthew Bazett fifth in council. The consultation addressed the long-standing problem of unsettled land tenure on the island. The council observed that since the retaking of St Helena from the Dutch the inhabitants had not been fixed in their estates and properties. The Lords Proprietors and the inhabitants alike had been prejudiced by this state of affairs, despite repeated orders from the old Company. A particular difficulty was that the lands lay unfenced, without landmarks or pillars to identify their bounds. This made it difficult to determine the extent of any parcel. The council recited its earlier decision, taken at a consultation on 8 February 1703, that a new register book should be kept. Each parcel of land was to be entered in the new book together with the lease or deed conveying it. Any planter or other party seeking to transfer land was to record the transfer in the register, identifying the parties and the parcel by reference to its earlier entry, with the entry confirming the validity of the transfer. The 1703 order had been made in accordance with an earlier order of the old Company to Captain Anthony Beale in 1678.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

|                    |                 | And this Order of Councell was [p]ursuant to an Order of the Antient Old Company to Cap[t]n Anthony Beale in 1678 And that We might the better Know the bounds and Landmarks &amp;c[a] Agree and consent that the Antient Old Law for Tenency in the 63 P[a]rragraph of A Letter dated 1[t] August 1683 and 1685 Should Commence a New from the 25 of March 1709, and the three years End the 25 of March 1712, at the Expiration of which time If the Inhabitants do not fence in their Lands they forfee[t] the Same to the Lords | To address the further problem of identifying the bounds and landmarks of each parcel, the council resolved to revive the ancient tenancy law contained in paragraph 63 of a letter dated 1 August 1683 and 1685. The three-year period set by that law was to begin afresh from 25 March 1709 and to end on 25 March 1712. If, at the expiration of that period, the inhabitants had not fenced in their lands, they were to forfeit the lands to the Lords Proprietors. Interpretations The 6 April 1711 consultation documents the island administration grappling with a structural problem of land tenure that had persisted since the retaking of the island from the Dutch in 1673. The recital that the inhabitants had not been fixed in their estates and properties for nearly forty years shows the council acknowledging that the underlying framework of land registration and boundary marking had remained incomplete despite repeated institutional efforts. The pattern reveals a tension between the formal aspiration of clear title and the practical reality of land held without proper fences, landmarks or pillars to identify its bounds. The reference back to the 1678 order of the old Company to Captain Anthony Beale, and the 1683 and 1685 letter containing paragraph 63 of the ancient tenancy law, establishes a documentary chain stretching across three decades of institutional concern with the same problem. The repetition of orders over so long a period indicates the difficulty of changing actual practice on the ground, with the inhabitants apparently continuing to hold and work their land without complying with the formal requirements of fencing and boundary marking. The current consultation represents a further attempt to enforce compliance through the threat of forfeiture. The decision to revive the three-year period from 25 March 1709 to 25 March 1712 sets a deadline for the inhabitants to fence in their lands. The choice of Lady Day as the starting point reflects the standard English legal calendar, and the three-year window gave the inhabitants until the spring of 1712 to bring their holdings into compliance. The forfeiture sanction shows the council using the strongest available remedy short of direct seizure, with the prospect of losing land providing the institutional pressure needed to overcome the inertia of established practice. The decision to keep a new register book, with each parcel entered together with the underlying lease or deed and with subsequent transfers recorded by cross-reference, established the documentary system that the later records show in operation. The 18 December 1707 register-recopying attestation by John Alexander, which had described the older book as unbound and decayed by rats, fits within this broader institutional effort to rebuild the registration system. The current 1711 consultation reinforces that the new system was to be maintained as the authoritative record, with each transfer requiring formal entry rather than private dealing. John Roberts as governor in April 1711 represents a transition from the earlier records, in which Thomas Goodwin had been described as governor from 1707. The change in personnel between the August 1708 council sessions and the April 1711 consultation indicates that the institutional leadership of the island had shifted, with Roberts now in the senior position and Walkborne continuing as deputy governor. The presence of Marsden, Griffeth and Bazett as third, fourth and fifth in council provides a fuller picture of the council's composition than the earlier records had shown. |

The structure shows the governor and deputy governor at the head, followed by three further members in defined order, with the seniority probably determining the order in which they signed deeds and gave their consent to council resolutions. The pattern matches the standard early-modern practice of senior officers in a corporate body acting in a fixed sequence according to their position. The threat of forfeiture to the Lords Proprietors as the sanction for failure to fence shows the Company asserting its underlying ownership of the island land. The inhabitants held their parcels under grants or leases from the Company, and the Company retained the right to reclaim land that was not maintained according to the terms of the original tenure. The mechanism converted the inhabitants' apparent freeholds into something closer to conditional tenancies, with continued ownership dependent on compliance with the institutional requirements. The recital of paragraph 63 of the 1683 and 1685 letter as the ancient tenancy law indicates that the original framework for land tenure on the island had been set out in detailed instructions from the Company to its officers on the island. The persistence of the same framework across nearly thirty years, despite the institutional changes between the old Company and the United East India Company, shows the continuity of the underlying legal structure. The current consultation revives rather than replaces that framework, applying the same three-year period to a new starting date. Speculations The decision by the council to set the three-year period running from 25 March 1709 rather than from the date of the consultation itself suggests an attempt to provide a measured timetable for compliance. By starting the clock at a date already past, the council in effect compressed the available remaining time to under twelve months from the April 1711 consultation to the March 1712 deadline. The structure may have reflected a judgement that the inhabitants had already had ample warning and that further indulgence would simply prolong the problem, with the truncated deadline acting as a stronger spur to action. The acknowledgement that the underlying issue had persisted since the retaking of the island, despite repeated orders dating back to 1678, points to a structural mismatch between the Company's institutional requirements and the practical realities of fencing land on the island. The labour, materials and time required to fence even a modest holding would have been considerable, and the inhabitants may have judged the effort uneconomic compared to the benefits of clearly demarcated bounds. The persistence of the problem suggests that the Company's preferred remedy was unattractive enough to the planter community to outweigh even repeated threats of institutional sanction. The use of forfeiture as the sanction shows the council reaching for the most direct institutional lever available. Lesser remedies, such as fines, levies or restrictions on transfer, had presumably been considered and rejected as insufficient. The forfeiture mechanism placed the cost of non-compliance directly on the inhabitants' principal asset, their land, and avoided the practical difficulty of collecting fines from a population whose cash resources were limited. The structure points to an institutional calculation that only the threat of losing land entirely would change established behaviour. |

Mr Bazett had received various warrants to measure and lay out the land, and he had laid the results before the council from time to time. The council ordered the following:A separate book to be kept for the plans and deeds, distinct from all other records.This consultation to be entered on the new book as a preamble.The order was signed by John Roberts, Edward Walkborne, William Marsden, Daniel Griffeth and Matthew Bazett. A separate writing was made by William Bidott, surgeon on the island, to John Alexander. Bidott sold to Alexander a messuage in Fort James Valley adjoining the house appertaining to Mary, daughter of Thomas Birch. The price was £25 0s 0d in current money of the island, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Bidott acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. Other good causes and considerations were also recited as moving him. The house had been a legacy left to Elizabeth Bidott, William's wife, by William Price under his last will and testament dated 1 December 1692. Alexander and his heirs took the house for ever. Bidott covenanted that Alexander and his successors would hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the property without disturbance from Bidott, his heirs, executors or assigns, or from any person acting through him. The deed was made on 24 March 1701 and sealed and delivered in the presence of Ripin Wells and Richard Alexander. William Bidott set his hand and seal to it. Interpretations The closing portion of the consultation reveals that Matthew Bazett was the council member responsible for the practical work of measuring and laying out the lands. The role placed him in the position of surveyor or land commissioner for the island, and his receipt of warrants to undertake specific measurements shows the council's reliance on a single trusted figure to translate the formal requirements of registration into physical reality on the ground. The pattern matches his earlier active role across the records as witness, principal in property transactions and accumulator of his own estate at Sheel Valley and Deep Valley. The decision to keep the plans and deeds in a separate book, with the present consultation entered as a preamble, shows the council establishing a dedicated record for the new system of land registration. The mechanism separates the formal land record from the consultation book and from other administrative records, giving the property registration its own authoritative document. The structure provides the institutional basis for the registry system that the later records show in operation, with John Alexander and his successors maintaining the book as the central reference for all land transactions. The Bidott to Alexander sale of 24 March 1701 documents a transaction by which the property passed through a legacy of an earlier deceased holder. William Price had left the house to Elizabeth Bidott by his will of 1 December 1692, and her husband William Bidott was now selling the inherited property to John Alexander. The mechanism shows how testamentary dispositions worked their way through multiple generations of ownership, with property bequeathed to a wife passing through her husband's hands in the sale and the original testator's name continuing to appear as part of the documentary chain. The naming of William Bidott as surgeon places him in a particular institutional category. As a surgeon on the island, he would have held a recognised |

The role gave him standing distinct from the soldier, gunner or free planter categories that the records most commonly use, and his appearance as the seller of inherited property shows that professional men with non-planter offices could nonetheless acquire and dispose of substantial holdings through marriage to a beneficiary. The boundary reference to the house belonging to Mary, daughter of Thomas Birch, identifies a property held by an unmarried woman in her own right. Mary Birch's named ownership of an adjacent house shows that daughters could hold urban property independently of their fathers or husbands, with the identification by reference to her father simply providing the kinship marker rather than indicating that the property belonged to him. The pattern is consistent with the broader presence of women as property holders across the records, including widows like Margaret Cotgrave, Sarah Harding and Dorothy Hayre, and now an unmarried daughter holding in her own name. John Alexander's acquisition of the Bidott house in March 1701 marks his appearance as a principal in a property transaction. His earlier roles in the records have been as register, witness and certifier of true copies, and the current deed shows him buying property in his own right while continuing to serve in his institutional capacity. The combination of official position and personal property dealings was characteristic of the small literate circle on the island, with Alexander joining Goodwin, Walkborne, Marsden and others in building a personal estate alongside his administrative duties. The use of the standard formula for divers good causes and considerations alongside the recited £25 0s 0d preserves the documentary convention of acknowledging unspecified additional elements of the bargain. The mechanism appeared in the Trapp to Goodwin sale of February 1690 and in many subsequent deeds, and its continued use here shows the planter community's reliance on the formula as a way of leaving side arrangements out of the written record while preserving their legal weight as consideration. Richard Alexander's appearance as a witness to the Bidott to John Alexander deed, in addition to Ripin Wells, suggests a family connection between the two Alexanders. Richard Alexander had earlier appeared as the buyer of a Chapel Valley dwelling house from John Hemon on 12 April 1704 and as the seller to George Dweight on 16 March 1710, and his role as witness to John Alexander's 1701 purchase places him as a probable kinsman supporting the senior figure in his property dealings. The pattern confirms the Alexander family's presence at the heart of the documentary system on the island. Speculations The institutional decision to keep a separate book for the plans and deeds, recorded in April 1711, indicates that the council viewed the land registration problem as serious enough to require a dedicated documentary infrastructure rather than simply additional entries in existing records. The separation gave the land registry an independent existence within the island's administrative system, and the choice to enter the consultation itself as the preamble to the book ensured that future readers would understand the institutional framework within which subsequent entries were made. The persistence of the Birch family name in the boundary descriptions, with Mary Birch as the daughter of Thomas Birch holding adjoining property, suggests that the Birch family had been settled in Fort James Valley for some considerable time. The Thomas Birch named here is probably the same man who had been |

The decision to sell the property to John Alexander for £25 0s 0d in cash, rather than to retain it for residential or rental use, points to Bidott preferring liquidity over property ownership. The mechanism let him convert an inherited urban asset into capital that he could use in his professional or personal affairs, and the choice of Alexander as the buyer reflects the natural circulation of property within the small literate and institutional circle on the island.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

The parcel lay in Sandy Bay under the main ridge. The parcel was bounded as follows:North the land of Thomas Perkins.East and West the land of William Naughton.South the land of Richard Swallow. Bagley and his successors held the premises for a term of twenty-one years, commencing on 25 March 1711. The lease was granted on the following conditions:Allegiance to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Honourable United Company and its successors.Obedience to law to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. Annual rent £5 5s 0d in good current money of the island, payable on the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, that is 25 March, each year. Condition of return at the expiration of the twenty-one-year term, to leave the land in as good a condition as at present. Restrictions on the lease no alteration of the boundary marks set out in the annexed roll, and no disposal of the lease or interest in it without the consent of the governor and council for the time being. The lease was sealed under the Company's common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 25 March 1711. Thomas Bagley set his hand and seal to the other part of the lease. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of John Roberts, governor, Edward Walkborne, deputy governor, William Marsden, third in council, Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, and Matthew Bazett, fifth in council. Interpretations The Company lease to Thomas Bagley of 25 March 1711 documents the implementation of the new tenure system that the consultation of 6 April 1711 would formalise eleven days later. The lease was sealed on 25 March, the very date that the consultation would identify as the starting point for the revived three-year fencing period, and the commencement of the twenty-one-year term from the same date shows the Company aligning the new lease with the institutional calendar of land tenure on the island. The structure suggests Bagley was among the early planters bringing their holdings into formal compliance under the new arrangements. The annual rent of £5 5s 0d for twenty-one acres works out at five shillings per acre, which is a substantial figure compared to the seven-shilling annual rent for the John Orchard ten-acre lease at Peter Bagley's of 10 April 1703. The Bagley lease therefore carries a rent more than fifteen times higher per acre than the Orchard lease, |

The pattern shows the Company calibrating its rents to the agricultural quality and location of each leased holding. The twenty-one-year term, in contrast to the ninety-nine-year terms of the earlier Paul Charles Sandy Bay lease of March 1705 and the John Orchard lease of April 1703, represents a shorter and more conventional length of tenure. The choice may reflect a deliberate institutional move away from the very long terms granted in earlier years, with the Company preferring to retain the ability to revisit its leases at more frequent intervals. The structure gives the Company the opportunity to adjust rents, terms or boundaries at the expiry of each term rather than committing the land for the lifetime of any planter and his successors. The restrictions on the lease, particularly the prohibition on disposing of the interest without the consent of the governor and council, mark a significant departure from the earlier pattern. The Orchard lease of 1703 had been freely assigned to Orlando Bagley in 1711 and the Heath leases of earlier years had been similarly transferable. The Bagley lease here introduces an institutional control over assignments, with the Company retaining the right to approve or block any onward transfer. The mechanism reflects the council's interest in maintaining direct oversight of who held its leased lands. The reference to the annexed roll showing the boundary marks indicates that the lease was accompanied by a survey or sketch identifying the precise extent of the parcel. The roll would have been part of the new documentary system that the April 1711 consultation would describe, with the plans and deeds being kept in a separate book. The Bagley lease therefore documents the working system of land registration that the council was formalising, with the lease itself serving as the textual instrument and the annexed roll providing the physical description. The boundary description names Thomas Perkins, William Naughton and Richard Swallow as the adjoining holders. Richard Swallow had earlier appeared in the records as the buyer of the Deep Valley mansion house from Thomas Cole on 5 June 1705 for £104 0s 0d, and his presence as the southern neighbour of the Bagley lease places his Sandy Bay holdings adjacent to Bagley's. Thomas Perkins and William Naughton do not appear in the earlier records reviewed in this set, and their identification here as adjoining holders introduces them as established planters in Sandy Bay by 1711. The reference to the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary as the rent day, with 25 March named as the relevant date, fits the standard English quarter-day calendar in which Lady Day served as the start of the legal year and as one of the four principal quarter days. The choice of this date aligned the lease with metropolitan practice and gave the Company a clear, calendar-fixed point for the receipt of rents. The pattern matches the Paul Gratton Lemon Garden lease of 23 December 1707, which also used Lady Day as the rent day. The signing of the lease by the full council of John Roberts, Edward Walkborne, William Marsden, Daniel Griffeth and Matthew Bazett shows the institutional weight given to the formal implementation of the new tenure system. The council members appear in the same order and with the same titles as in the 6 April 1711 consultation, confirming that the same body was responsible for both the policy decisions and the individual leases issued under them. The mechanism gave the Bagley lease the full backing of the council and demonstrated the seriousness with which the new arrangements were being applied. Speculations |

The mechanism would have let the council regularise the position of planters whose earlier titles were uncertain or whose holdings had not been formally registered, with the new leases providing both clear documentation and a regular stream of rental income. The pattern points to an institutional restructuring of the entire land tenure system around the new framework. The introduction of the requirement for council consent to any disposal of the lease represents a significant institutional intervention in the operation of the planter property market. Under the earlier free assignment regime, leases had circulated within the planter community in much the same way as freeholds, with the Company having no role in approving the new holder. The current restriction gave the council a veto over who took the land, and the mechanism may have been intended either to maintain agricultural standards by approving only competent assignees, or to maintain political control by approving only loyal planters. The five-shilling-per-acre annual rent on the Bagley lease compares unfavourably with the very low rents recorded in earlier leases, and the increase points either to a general rise in agricultural rents or to a particular institutional decision to extract higher returns from leased land. If the new tenure system was intended to apply across all leased holdings on the island, the increased rents would have generated a substantial flow of revenue to the Company, and the structure of twenty-one-year terms ensured that the rents could be revisited at relatively frequent intervals to keep pace with changing conditions.  |

She acknowledged the sum as received and gave a full discharge. The land had formerly been the lot of the late Tehu Cotgrave, free planter of the island, and had passed to his eldest son Gilbert Cotgrave, who had held it until his death. The parcel lay in Youngs Valley on the east of the island. It adjoined Alexander's own land, formerly the lot of John Matthews. Interpretations The Company grant to John Roberts of April 1711 records the governor receiving a personal grant of waste ground in James Valley from the institution that he himself served. The structure raises an inherent question of self-dealing, since Roberts presided over the council that sealed the grant, but the formal involvement of the deputy governor and three other council members provided the appearance of institutional approval. The mechanism shows how the senior office-holder could acquire personal property through the Company's land system while occupying the position that had to authorise the grant. The annual ground rent of five shillings represents a low figure even by the standards of waste-ground grants. The Orchard lease of April 1703 had carried an annual rent of seven shillings for ten acres of leased land, and the current grant gives Roberts a freehold of a substantial waste plot for less than that figure. The contrast between Roberts's terms and the conditions imposed on other planters under the new tenure regime, including the higher rents and shorter terms documented in the Thomas Bagley lease of the same period, points to favourable treatment of the governor by his own council. The location of the parcel between the Store Yard wall and the Churchyard wall places it at the heart of the institutional and religious centre of James Town. The Store Yard would have been the working area of the Company's storehouse, and the Churchyard the burial ground attached to the island's church. The acquisition of waste ground between these two fixed institutional features by the governor in his personal capacity gave him a strategically located urban parcel adjacent to the principal Company buildings. The provision that Roberts could take whatever ground he could make backwards to the watercourse is unusual within the records. The phrase indicates that the rear boundary of the parcel was not fixed at a specific distance but extended to the watercourse, allowing Roberts to develop the land as far back as he could reach. The mechanism gave him an open-ended depth to the parcel and let him define its rear boundary by his own development activity. The structure is more favourable than a fixed rectangular parcel and suggests deliberate generosity towards the governor. The appended note recording the Honourable Company's later repurchase of the parcel from Roberts in London for £15 0s 0d documents the eventual unwinding of the original grant. The £15 0s 0d represents a substantial sum for a parcel that had carried a ground rent of only five shillings per year, and the figure suggests that Roberts had either developed the parcel during his ownership or that the Company simply paid him out at a price reflecting his personal standing. The mechanism let the Company recover the land it had granted while compensating Roberts for the surrender of his title. The Cotgrave to Alexander sale of seventy acres at Youngs Valley for £90 0s 0d represents one of the larger rural transactions on record. The figure works out at about £1 6s 0d per acre, which falls toward the lower end of the upland market established by other deeds. The land lay on the east of the island in Youngs Valley, an area mentioned earlier in the records through the Thomas Dixon to Samuel Des Fontaine sale of November 1701, which had moved ten acres at the head of Youngs Valley between two members of the garrison. |

|              |              |                   | The recital that the land had been the lot of the late Tehu Cotgrave and had passed to his eldest son Gilbert Cotgrave shows the operation of inheritance by primogeniture within the planter community. The eldest son took the family lot as the principal heir, with younger children presumably receiving other forms of provision. The mechanism preserved the integrity of the family estate across generations and concentrated land in the hands of the senior male line. The current sale by Elinor as Gilbert's widow shows the property passing out of the Cotgrave family on her decision to dispose of it after her husband's death. Elinor Cotgrave's identification as widow and relict of Gilbert Cotgrave places her in the same category as the other substantial widows in the records, including Margaret Cotgrave, who had been the widow of John Cotgrave and had held a Chapel Valley dwelling house and a ten-acre Sharks Valley parcel. The recurrence of widows named Cotgrave across different transactions confirms the family's persistent presence on the island, with several generations of Cotgrave men predeceasing their wives and the widows inheriting and managing substantial holdings. The Cotgrave family's earlier appearance in the records includes the 99-year lease taken by John Cotgrave from Elizabeth Rhodes on 27 October 1687, the Chapel Valley dwelling house bought by John Cotgrave from Thomas Tewdsdale on 19 April 1694, and the witnessing role of Gilbert Cotgrave in the 4 May 1709 sale by Thomas Goodwin to Henry Francis. The Tehu Cotgrave identified here as the original lot-holder is probably the same man as the John Cotgrave of the earlier records, with Tehu representing a variant of the same name in transcription. John Alexander's purchase of the seventy acres from Elinor Cotgrave shows him expanding his rural holdings on a substantial scale. His earlier records had included the purchase of the Bidott house in Fort James Valley in March 1701 and his continuing role as register, witness and certifier across the records. The acquisition of seventy acres at Youngs Valley adjoining his existing land formerly John Matthews's gives him a consolidated rural estate of meaningful size, and the structure shows Alexander building on his existing holding to create a larger working unit. Speculations The grant of waste ground to the governor in his personal capacity, signed by his own council, points to an institutional practice in which senior officers could acquire favourable property terms from the institution they served. The very low ground rent of five shillings per year, combined with the open-ended rear boundary extending to the watercourse, gave Roberts terms more favourable than those imposed on ordinary planters under the new tenure regime. The mechanism suggests that the Company tolerated such grants as part of the compensation system for its senior officers, with the formal involvement of the council providing the institutional cover for what was effectively a personal benefit. The later repurchase of the parcel by the Honourable Company in London for £15 0s 0d, recorded in the appended note, indicates that the original grant had appreciated substantially in value during Roberts's ownership. The £15 0s 0d figure represents sixty years of ground rent at the five-shilling annual rate, and the willingness of the Company in London to pay this sum to its former governor reflects either the development of the parcel during his ownership or an institutional decision to compensate him generously on the surrender of the title. The transaction in London, rather than on the island, suggests it was negotiated after Roberts's return to England. Elinor Cotgrave's decision to sell the entire seventy-acre Youngs Valley parcel to John Alexander, rather than to retain it for her own use or to divide it among her children, suggests she preferred liquidity over land |

The £90 0s 0d in current money would have given her substantial cash for her own provision, and the choice of Alexander as the buyer reflects the natural circulation of property within the small literate and institutional circle on the island. The mechanism let her convert an inherited rural estate into capital that could support her household without the labour and management burden of working the land.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

The parcels were as follows: Twenty acres of waste tree land bounded east by the lands of Bowman and Jeffreys, west by the lands of the Beale orphans, north by the land of William Marsh, and south by the main ridge. Twenty and a quarter acres bounded east by the land of Leonard Hunt, west by the lands of the Beale orphans and the Honourable Company, north by the lands of Leonard Hunt and the Honourable Company's waste land, and south by the lands of the Beale orphans and Leonard Coulson. Ten acres bounded east by the lands of Leonard Hunt and the orphans of William Doveton, west by the Honourable Company's waste land, north by the land of the orphans of Leonard Coulson, and south by Jonathan Doveton's own hired land. Doveton's right and title to the fifty and a quarter acres had been confirmed by a consultation held on 13 March 1711. Notice had been given by beat of drum for any person to make a claim on a specified day, but no one had appeared and no objection had been made. Doveton and his heirs took the premises for ever, on the following conditions: Allegiance to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Honourable Company and its successors. Obedience to law to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The grant was sealed under the Company's common seal at the Castle on the island on 17 April 1711. The plots and plans of the several parcels were annexed to the grant, and a copy of the deed and plans was entered in the register book. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of John Roberts, governor, Edward Walkborne, deputy governor, William Marsden, third in council, Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, fifth in council, and Thomas Greene, register. Two later notes were added to the deed: A note on a subsequent transaction recording that the land was sold to Mr Long by Andrew Wilson on 13 April 1725. A note on an exchange recording that two acres of the hired land were exchanged with Jonathan Doveton for two pieces of land he had bought from Edward Mashin, as appeared in consultations held on 28 August and February 1712. The deed was drawn to a scale of ten chains, or forty rods. Thomas Greene served as register. Interpretations The Company grant to Jonathan Doveton of 17 April 1711 documents the institutional confirmation of an established holding through the procedure described in the consultation of 6 April 1711. The grant covers fifty and a quarter acres across three separate parcels, and the recital that the confirmation followed a public notice by beat of drum without any objection shows the council using a formal claim procedure to settle long-standing tenure questions. The mechanism gave the inhabitants a fixed opportunity to assert competing rights, with silence in response treated as acceptance of the holder's title. |

The drum was the standard mechanism for assembling the population or for making public announcements in a community where literacy was limited and where formal publication channels did not exist. The choice of this means of notification ensured that all the inhabitants would have known of the proposed confirmation and could make their claims if they had any, and the formal recording of the procedure in the deed gave it legal weight as a public proceeding. The three parcels confirmed to Doveton, with detailed boundary descriptions naming the Beale orphans, William Marsh, Leonard Hunt, Leonard Coulson, the orphans of William Doveton and the orphans of Leonard Coulson as adjoining holders, give an unusually full picture of the surrounding tenure pattern. The repeated references to orphans as holders of adjoining parcels show that several families had lost their principal male holders and that the orphans' interests continued to be recognised as boundary references in subsequent deeds. The mechanism shows how the death of a free planter did not extinguish the family's land interest, but instead transferred it to the next generation under the orphans' protection. The reference to Jonathan Doveton's own hired land, distinct from the parcels being confirmed in freehold, identifies a further category of holding within his overall estate. Hired land would have been parcels held under lease from the Company or from another planter, with the rent paid annually but the underlying ownership remaining with the lessor. The combination of freehold and leasehold holdings within a single planter's estate was characteristic of the more substantial households on the island, and the structure shows Doveton operating across multiple tenure forms within his working unit. The annexation of the plots and plans to the grant, with a copy entered in the register book, documents the new system of land registration in operation. The April 1711 consultation had ordered the keeping of a separate book for plans and deeds, and the present grant shows the system actively being used to record both the textual conveyance and the physical extent of the land. The mechanism gave the registration system its visual dimension, with the plans providing the means to identify each parcel on the ground. The signature of Thomas Greene as register, alongside the council members, marks his appearance in that role. The earlier records had named John Alexander as register from at least 1686 and Philip Forsy as register of the Beale brothers' sales of February 1716. Thomas Greene's appearance as register in April 1711 fits between these two figures and shows the office passing through several hands during the transitional period of the new registration system. The mechanism reflects either the natural turnover of the office or the institutional reorganisation that accompanied the new tenure framework. The note recording the later sale of the land to Mr Long by Andrew Wilson on 13 April 1725 indicates that the parcels confirmed to Doveton in 1711 had passed through Andrew Wilson before reaching Mr Long fourteen years later. The Andrew Wilson named here is probably the same man who had received the original Company grant of twenty acres in Sandy Bay on 16 August 1684 or a successor of the same name. The pattern shows the continuing movement of land between holders over the longer term, with the register preserving the chain of ownership through successive transactions. The note recording the exchange of two acres of hired land for two pieces of land bought by Doveton from Edward Mashin, by reference to consultations of 28 August and February 1712, shows the council managing the boundaries of Doveton's holdings through formal exchanges. The mechanism let Doveton consolidate his |

The structure parallels the Company's broader use of exchanges as a tool of land management. The scale of ten chains or forty rods given on the annexed plan provides a precise measure of the survey work that accompanied the grants. A chain was twenty-two yards or sixty-six feet, and ten chains therefore represented 220 yards or 660 feet, with forty rods equivalent at sixteen and a half feet per rod. The use of these standard English surveying measures shows the island administration applying the same units used in metropolitan land registration, with the annexed plans drawn to the same scale conventions as English surveys of the period. Speculations The substantial size of Doveton's confirmed holdings, totalling fifty and a quarter acres across three parcels and accompanied by additional hired land, suggests he was one of the more substantial planters whose tenure required formal confirmation under the new system. The combination of public notice by beat of drum and detailed boundary descriptions reflects the council's view that confirmation of a holding of this size required particular procedural care to forestall any later challenge. The mechanism gave Doveton's title an exceptionally well-documented foundation, and the formal involvement of the entire council reinforced the institutional weight of the grant. The frequent references to orphans of various families as the adjoining holders, with the Beale orphans, the orphans of William Doveton and the orphans of Leonard Coulson all named, suggest that the period had seen a notable level of mortality among the free planters. The pattern is consistent with the high mortality conditions of early-modern colonial settlements, where adult males in particular faced substantial risks from disease, accident or other causes. The continuing recognition of orphans' interests in the boundary descriptions shows the island administration maintaining the legal framework for protecting minor heirs across multiple families. The eventual sale of the parcels to Mr Long by Andrew Wilson in April 1725, recorded in the appended note, shows the continuing circulation of substantial holdings through successive hands across more than a decade after the original confirmation. The mechanism suggests that the formal confirmation of title under the 1711 system had given the parcels a clear and transferable foundation, with subsequent holders able to deal in them as recognised freeholds. The structure points to the success of the new system in creating a documented basis for land ownership that supported a functioning property market.  |

Jonathan Doveton set his hand and seal to the other part of the lease. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, fifth in council, and Thomas Greene, register. Two later notes were added to the lease: A note recording that the two acres of cabbage tree land were hired out for the Company as appeared in a consultation of 24 February 1712. A note recording an exchange the same two acres were exchanged for two acres on James Head from Edward Mash, as appeared in a consultation of 28 February 1712. Thomas Greene served as register. The annexed plan identified the two parcels as figure C for the nine acres of gumwood and figure D for the two acres of cabbage tree land. Interpretations The Company lease to Jonathan Doveton of 17 April 1711 documents an arrangement covering two specific types of land within the same instrument. The two acres of cabbage tree land and the nine acres of gumwood land were treated as separate categories, with the lease setting different rents for each in the proportion of one shilling for the cabbage tree and four shillings for the gumwood. The structure shows the council distinguishing between different qualities or uses of land within a single leasehold, with the rent reflecting the productive value of each category. The lease was sealed on the same day as the Company's freehold grant to Doveton of fifty and a quarter acres, and the two instruments together represent a coordinated settlement of his entire tenure position. The freehold grant confirmed his title to the larger parcels under the new public-notice procedure, and the leasehold gave him formal possession of the smaller cabbage tree and gumwood parcels on a twenty-one-year term. The structure shows the council using freehold and leasehold instruments as complementary tools, applying each to the form of tenure most appropriate to the particular parcel. The recital that the fences served as the landmarks identifying the boundaries of the plot, with the prohibition on altering them, gives a particular function to the physical features of the land. The fences were not merely agricultural infrastructure but legal markers fixing the precise extent of the leased ground. The mechanism let the council enforce the boundaries through the physical reality of the fencing, with any alteration triggering the alteration of the annexed plan and thus the lease itself. The structure reinforces the institutional commitment to clear, marked |

Cabbage trees would have been the indigenous tree species producing edible cabbages from their growing tips, valued for fresh vegetables and for ship's victualling. Gumwood was a hardwood tree species used for construction, fuel and timber. The naming of the parcels by their dominant species reflects the practice of identifying land by its principal product, in the same way as the Lemon Garden, the Purslane Bed and other similar names in the records. The restriction on disposal without the consent of the governor and council, mirroring the provision in the Thomas Bagley lease of 25 March 1711, confirms that the new tenure system had introduced this institutional control across the leases issued under it. The Company retained the right to approve or block any onward transfer, and the mechanism gave the council continuing oversight of who held the leased lands. The provision marks a significant departure from the earlier pattern of freely transferable leases. The two notes recording later transactions on the cabbage tree parcel illustrate the dynamic management of leasehold interests under the new system. The first note, of 24 February 1712, records that the two acres were hired out for the Company, indicating that the Company itself or a third party operating on its behalf took the parcel under sub-tenancy. The second note, of 28 February 1712, records the exchange of the same two acres for two acres at James Head bought by Doveton from Edward Mash. The two notes within four days of each other show the council actively managing the parcel's position through multiple successive transactions. The Edward Mash named in the exchange is presumably the same person who, by some variant of the surname, appears elsewhere in the records. The 13 April 1725 sale by Andrew Wilson to Mr Long recorded on the earlier Doveton grant, and the 1712 exchange recorded here, both show the parcels passing through subsequent transactions over the years after the original grant. The mechanism shows the new tenure system supporting an active secondary market in land, with the formal registration system tracking each transfer. Thomas Greene's signature as register, on both the lease and the appended notes of 1712, confirms his continuing tenure in that office during the implementation period of the new system. His role spans the recording of the original grant and lease, the subsequent transactions affecting the parcels and the cross-references to the consultation book. The structure shows the register's office as the institutional pivot of the new system, with Greene providing continuity across the transitions in council membership and individual transactions. Speculations The decision to lease the cabbage tree and gumwood parcels under a twenty-one-year term, rather than to include them in the freehold grant of the same date, suggests the council viewed these particular categories of land as warranting institutional retention rather than outright alienation. The cabbage tree parcel in particular, with its product useful for victualling ships, would have had strategic value for the Company's continuing operations, and the leasehold form let the Company retain ultimate control over the parcel while allowing Doveton to work it for the term. The almost immediate hiring out of the two-acre cabbage tree parcel for the Company within ten months of the lease's commencement points to the Company recovering the parcel almost as soon as it had granted it. The mechanism may have reflected a deliberate strategy of leasing strategic parcels to established planters with the |

The subsequent exchange of the same parcel for two acres at James Head suggests further adjustments were made to bring the land into a form more useful for the Company's purposes. The pricing structure of the lease, with five shillings total per year split as four shillings for the gumwood and one shilling for the cabbage tree, indicates the council placed a higher value on the gumwood land than on the cabbage tree. The ratio of four to one suggests that the gumwood was either more productive on a per-acre basis or commanded a more valuable end product. The mechanism gave the council a refined tool for setting rents that reflected the differential productivity of land categories, and the structure points to a sophisticated understanding of the agricultural and commercial value of the different types of holding.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

The sum was paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Grandy acknowledged the payment and gave a full discharge. The land lay in the valley adjoining the lands of Margaret Cotgrave, widow. The parcel was the lower ten acres formerly belonging to the late John Matthews, free planter, and had been in the possession and occupation of Thomas Beem senior. The original holding had been a bounty and free gift of the Right Honourable English East India Company to the previous holder and his heirs. Alexander and his heirs took the land to dispose of at their own will and pleasure for ever. Grandy covenanted that Alexander and his successors would hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the bargained premises without any hindrance, molestation or interruption from him, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, or from any person claiming through them. The deed was made on 26 November 1701 and sealed, signed and delivered in the presence of John Oslodd and Erasmus Pirling. James Grandy signed by his mark in the form of I. Philip Tovey certified the deed as a true copy in his capacity as register. Interpretations The Grandy to Alexander sale of 26 November 1701 documents a transaction in which the consideration was paid entirely in Spanish dollars at a fixed conversion rate. The £40 0s 0d at six shillings per dollar works out at 133 and one third dollars, although the deed does not specify the exact count. The use of Spanish dollars as the sole medium of payment, combined with the explicit statement of the conversion rate, reveals how the island's monetary system depended on multiple currencies operating in parallel. The earlier Draper to Maxwell sale of 29 November 1699 had used the same six-shilling rate for Spanish dollars, confirming the persistence of the conversion factor across a two-year period. The recital of the chain of ownership traces the land through four successive holders. The original grant was a bounty and free gift from the East India |

The use of bounty and free gift to describe the Company's original grant emphasises that the parcel had been transferred without consideration of money, perhaps as a reward for service or as part of the early settlement of the island. The naming of John Matthews as the original recipient connects the current sale to the 1682 inquest, where John Matthews had been recorded among the original allottees. The parcel here described as the lower ten acres of Matthews's holding suggests that the original allotment had been larger and had been divided over the intervening period. The current sale concerns only the lower portion, and the upper portion may have remained with the Matthews family or have been sold separately to another holder. The boundary reference to Margaret Cotgrave, widow, identifies one of the major widow holders in the records. Margaret Cotgrave had been the widow and relict of John Cotgrave, free planter, and had held the Chapel Valley dwelling house bought by her late husband from Thomas Tewsdale in April 1694 and the ten-acre Sharks Valley parcel taken on a 99-year lease from Elizabeth Rhodes in October 1687. Her name as the neighbouring holder to the Grandy parcel places her land adjacent to the former Matthews allotment, indicating that the Cotgrave holdings extended across more than one valley. The location of the parcel in the valley adjoining Margaret Cotgrave's lands, without a specific valley name being given in the present deed, suggests that the parties relied on the reference to Cotgrave's lands to fix the location. The vagueness of the geographical description is unusual within the records, where parcels are normally identified by a named valley. The mechanism may reflect the parties' familiarity with the layout of the land, with the reference to Cotgrave's adjacent holding being sufficient to identify the parcel without further specification. Philip Tovey's appearance as register, certifying the deed as a true copy, introduces another holder of that office. The earlier Beale brothers' deed of 9 February 1716 had been certified by Philip Forsy as register, and the Thomas Greene who appeared in the April 1711 records had also held the office. The succession of registers across the period from John Alexander through Greene, Forsy and now Tovey, with the dates of each man's tenure not always clear from the records, reflects the natural turnover of the office and the importance attached to the formal certification of true copies. The Spanish dollar at six shillings as the conversion factor reveals the role of the dollar within the island's monetary system. The Spanish dollar was a widely circulating silver coin in the Atlantic and Indian Ocean trade networks, with a standardised silver content that made it a stable unit of account. The fixing of the dollar at six shillings of island currency provides a working conversion that the parties could use to calibrate transactions denominated in either currency. The mechanism shows how the island's monetary system operated on multiple parallel standards, with the dollar serving alongside sterling, island currency and store credit as a recognised medium of value. The witnesses John Oslodd and Erasmus Pirling do not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed in this set. The presence of unfamiliar names as witnesses to a transaction reflects the broader circulation of inhabitants on the island, with men from outside the established network of repeated witnesses occasionally appearing in the records. The current sale of ten acres for £40 0s 0d to John Alexander shows Grandy as a dealer in both urban cottages and rural parcels, and the two transactions together place him among the more active sellers of property in the period. Speculations The decision by James Grandy to take the entire consideration in Spanish dollars rather than in island currency or in a mix of currencies suggests a particular preference for the dollar over local money. The Spanish dollar would have been a portable and widely accepted form of value, useful for transactions outside the immediate island economy and for any departure from the island. The choice may indicate that Grandy was either preparing to leave the island, to send funds elsewhere, or to use the dollars in trade with passing ships and visiting merchants. The reference to the original Company grant as a bounty and free gift suggests the Company had used grants of land as a means of attracting and rewarding settlers in the early period of the island's colonisation. The mechanism would have helped the Company build up a population of free planters without requiring substantial capital outlay from the settlers themselves, and the land would then have generated value through cultivation and the labour of the new holders. The reference to the parcel as a bounty preserves the original character of the grant even as the land has now passed through multiple intermediate hands. The 1701 dating of the deed places it before the major reorganisation of the land tenure system documented in the 1711 consultation. The mechanism of recording the chain of ownership through a chain of holders, the use of marks rather than signatures by some parties, and the certification by a register reflect the practice in operation before the new system was introduced. The deed therefore documents the working land registration system as it operated in the earlier period, with the various administrative reforms of the following decade building on the foundations seen in this transaction. |

The recital that Coulson was son and heir of the late Leonard Coulson shows the council acknowledging an inheritance descent that had occurred before the formal confirmation, and the mechanism gave the next generation of the Coulson family a documented title to the parcel that the father had held. The boundary description identifies the Widow Coulson as the eastern neighbour, distinct from John Leonard Coulson himself. The Widow Coulson is presumably the widow of Leonard Coulson and the mother of the present grantee, holding adjacent land in her own right as part of her dower or marital provision. The structure shows the Coulson family holding two separate parcels: the gumwood land confirmed to the son and the adjoining land held by the mother as widow. The mechanism reveals how the family's estate was divided between the surviving spouse and the heir, with each holding land in their own name. The reference to a consultation of 31 March 1711 as the basis for the confirmation, with public notice given by beat of drum, follows the same procedure as the Jonathan Doveton confirmation of 17 April 1711. The mechanism of public notice and the recording of any claims that might be made gave the council a formal process for resolving uncertain or contested tenures, with silence in response to the notice treated as acceptance of the holder's title. The pattern shows the council systematically using this procedure across multiple confirmations during the spring of 1711. The Coulson family had earlier appeared in the records through Mrs Grace Coulson, named as the boundary holder to the Chapel Valley town tenement in the Edmunds to Goodwin deed of 10 May 1700, and through the late Leonard Coulson, identified as the former owner of the female slave Sue in the Bodley to Doveton exchange of 13 August 1708. The current grant identifies John Leonard Coulson as the son and heir, and the boundary reference to the orphans of Leonard Coulson in the earlier 17 April 1711 grant to Doveton indicates that several Coulson children survived as joint heirs to other parts of the family estate. The mechanism shows the family's holdings being distributed among multiple beneficiaries after Leonard Coulson's death. The appended note recording the later sale of the land in 1733 to Jonathan Doveton by Robert and Mary Aikin shows the continuing movement of the parcel through subsequent generations. The pattern indicates that the land passed from the Coulson family to the Aikin household before being sold to Doveton more than twenty years after the original 1711 confirmation. The reference to a consultation of 31 August 1733 and to the next book at folio 80 suggests that the council's involvement in approving land transfers had continued into the next decade, with the consultation book maintaining its role as the record of substantive decisions. The Jonathan Doveton to whom the land was sold in 1733 is probably either the same Jonathan Doveton of the 1711 records or a son or successor of the same name. The acquisition of the parcel by Doveton in 1733 brought it |

The mechanism shows the continuing accumulation of land by the Doveton household across multiple decades, with the boundaries of the Doveton holdings expanding through successive purchases. Thomas Greene's role as register, signing the deed alongside the council members, confirms his tenure of the office during the implementation of the new tenure system. The pattern of his appearances across the grants and leases of April 1711 shows him as the institutional pivot of the registration system, with each formal grant being attested by his signature and a copy being entered in the register book. The mechanism gave the new system its documentary continuity, with Greene's presence ensuring that the formal requirements were observed across multiple transactions. The use of the species name gumwood to identify the parcel reflects the practice of categorising land by its dominant tree cover, in the same way as the cabbage tree parcel in the Doveton lease of the same date. The gumwood parcels would have been valued for their timber resource, which had practical applications in construction, fuel and ship's stores. The naming convention shows the council distinguishing between different categories of land within the formal tenure framework, with each category attracting its own rent and term where the land was leased rather than granted. Speculations The decision by the council to confirm the ten acres of gumwood to John Leonard Coulson by way of public notice and beat of drum suggests that the tenure of the parcel had been uncertain before the 1711 procedure. The Coulson family's holdings had been divided between the widow and multiple children, and the formal confirmation of the son's title to this particular parcel may have been necessary to resolve any ambiguity about which member of the family held which part of the estate. The mechanism gave John Leonard Coulson a clean title in his own name, free of any competing claims from his mother, siblings or other relatives. The later sale of the parcel in 1733 to Jonathan Doveton, recorded in the appended note, shows the eventual consolidation of the gumwood parcel within the larger Doveton holdings. The mechanism would have given Doveton a substantial continuous block by adding the Coulson ten acres to his existing land, which the original 1711 grant had described as the southern neighbour of the Coulson gumwood. The pattern points to the long-term tendency of land to accumulate in the hands of the more active and successful planter households, with smaller and less prominent holdings being absorbed into larger estates over time. The procedural detail of the consultation of 31 March 1711 being followed by the formal grant of 17 April 1711, just over two weeks later, suggests that the council was running a structured programme of confirmations during this period. The mechanism would have allowed the council to consider individual claims at the consultation, with the formal grant being issued only after the public notice period had expired and no objections had been raised. The structure points to the implementation of the new tenure system as a deliberate institutional exercise spread across several weeks of intensive work, with each parcel being processed through a defined sequence of steps. |

The parcel was bounded as follows: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>East the land of the Widow Coulson.</li> <li>West the Company's waste land.</li> <li>North the Company's waste land.</li> <li>South the land of Jonathan Doveton.</li> </ul> Coulson and his successors held the parcel for a term of twenty-one years, commencing on 25 March 1711. The lease was granted on the following conditions: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>Allegiance to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Honourable United Company and its successors.</li> <li>Obedience to law to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island.</li> <li>Annual rent five shillings per annum in good and current money of the island, made up of four shillings per acre plus one shilling duty, payable on the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, that is 25 March, each year.</li> <li>Condition of return at the expiration of the twenty-one-year term, to leave the fences in as good repair as at present.</li> <li>Restrictions on the lease no alteration of the fences, which served as the landmarks identifying the boundaries of the plot annexed to the lease, and no disposal of the lease or interest in it without the consent of the governor and council for the time being.</li> </ul> The lease was sealed under the Company's common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 17 April 1711. John Leonard Coulson set his hand and seal to the other part of the lease. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, fifth in council, and Thomas Greene, register. Jonas Doveton signed as executor. Interpretations The Company lease to John Leonard Coulson of 17 April 1711 documents the same coordinated approach to tenure that the parallel Doveton lease of the same date had shown. The two acres of gumwood land were granted on a twenty-one-year term running from the same 25 March 1711 commencement date, and the boundary description identifies the parcel as a smaller adjunct to the ten acres of gumwood land that the freehold grant of the same day had confirmed to Coulson. The mechanism shows the council distinguishing between the larger inherited holding to be confirmed as freehold and the smaller adjoining parcel to be granted as a twenty-one-year lease. The rent structure of four shillings per acre plus one shilling duty, totalling five shillings per annum for the two acres, sets a different rate from the Doveton lease of the same date. The Doveton lease had imposed four shillings for the nine acres of gumwood and one shilling for the two acres of cabbage tree, giving a total of five shillings for eleven acres. The Coulson lease imposes the same total of five shillings for only two acres, indicating a per-acre rent more than five times higher than the Doveton gumwood rate. The disparity is unusual and points either to a particular feature of the Coulson parcel or to a different basis of calculation between the two leases. The signature of Jonas Doveton as executor at the foot of the lease introduces a procedural feature not seen |

The presence of Doveton as executor suggests that the Coulson lease involved a third-party trustee or representative whose role required formal acknowledgement. The earlier records had named Jonathan Doveton as the executor of the William Dufton estate alongside Daniel Griffeth, and the current appearance of Jonas Doveton, probably the same man under a slight name variant, in a similar role suggests his standing as a recognised executor across multiple estates. The connection between Jonas Doveton's role as executor and John Leonard Coulson as the lessee raises the question of whether the late Leonard Coulson had named Doveton among his executors. The mechanism would have placed Doveton in a position of fiduciary responsibility for the management of the Coulson estate during the period when John Leonard Coulson, as son and heir, was establishing his title to the various parcels. The signature of Doveton on the lease would have given the institutional process the formal involvement of the executor, ensuring that the lease was properly attested on behalf of the estate. The southern boundary reference to Jonathan Doveton's land places the Coulson parcel adjacent to the larger Doveton estate that the same day's grants had confirmed. The structure of the boundaries shows the Doveton and Coulson holdings sitting side by side, with the Widow Coulson's land to the east of the Coulson parcel and Doveton's freehold and leasehold parcels to the south. The pattern indicates a continuous block of contiguous tenure with the two families holding adjoining parcels under the new system. The institutional restriction on disposal of the lease without the consent of the governor and council, repeating the provision in the Thomas Bagley and Jonathan Doveton leases of the same period, confirms that the new tenure system applied this control uniformly across all leases issued in the spring of 1711. The mechanism gave the council oversight of any onward transfer of leasehold interests, and the consistent application of the requirement shows the council's commitment to maintaining institutional control over leased land. The signature of only Daniel Griffeth and Matthew Bazett among the council members, with Thomas Greene as register, indicates that the full council had not been required for the sealing of the lease. The earlier major grants of 17 April 1711 had been sealed in the presence of the full council, but the smaller individual leases were attested by a reduced number of officers. The pattern shows the council operating with flexibility in the formal requirements for sealing, with the full quorum reserved for the more substantial grants and the smaller leases requiring only the minimum necessary signatures. Speculations The grant of a freehold for ten acres and a separate leasehold for two acres to the same person on the same day, with both parcels described as gumwood land bounded by the same neighbours, suggests that the council had drawn a specific line between the parts of the Coulson holding that warranted freehold confirmation and those that required leasehold treatment. The mechanism may have reflected the council's judgement about which parts of the inherited estate had a clear documentary basis for freehold confirmation and which required leasehold formalisation under the new system. The structure shows the council using both tenure forms as complementary instruments for settling the tenure of a single family's holdings. The per-acre rent of two shillings sixpence on the Coulson leasehold, compared with the per-acre rent of approximately fivepence on the Doveton gumwood, indicates that the Coulson parcel was being valued at a much higher rate. The Doveton lease covered nine acres of gumwood for four shillings total, giving a per-acre rate well below sixpence, while the Coulson lease imposes five |

The disparity may reflect either a particular feature of the Coulson land, such as its proximity to the main farmland or the quality of its timber, or a different basis of calculation that the records do not explain. The role of Jonas Doveton as executor, signing alongside the council members, suggests that the late Leonard Coulson had appointed him as one of the executors of his will. The mechanism would have given Doveton a continuing institutional role in the management of the Coulson estate, and the involvement of an established free planter as executor for another family was a recognised practice in the records. The pattern indicates that the small literate circle on the island took on executor responsibilities for multiple estates, with men like Daniel Griffeth and Jonas Doveton appearing as executors across several different family arrangements.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

|                    |                 | Govern[r] W[m] Marsden 3[d] in Coun[m] Daniel Griffeth 4[th] in Coun[m] Matthew Bazett 5[th] in Coun[m] Thomas Greene Register | Doveton and John Leonard Coulson, with the same procedural framework of consultation hearing, public notice by beat of drum and formal grant by the council. The structure shows the council systematically working through the established holdings on the island, with each family's tenure being confirmed in turn through the same defined sequence of steps. The recital that James Reder was son and heir of the late James Reder identifies the grant as an inheritance confirmation rather than a new allocation. The mechanism gave the next generation of the Reder family a documented title to the parcels that the father had held, in the same way as the Coulson confirmation had recognised John Leonard Coulson's inheritance from his father. The pattern shows the new tenure system functioning as an instrument for regularising the tenure of inherited holdings, with the formal grant providing the documentary foundation for the heir's title. The thirty-two-acre main parcel comprising twenty acres of gumwood and twelve acres of cabbage tree land introduces the categorisation of contiguous land by its dominant tree cover. The two categories appear within a single boundary description, indicating that the parcels formed a continuous block rather than separate holdings. The mechanism shows the council distinguishing between different vegetation types within the same boundary line, with the gumwood and cabbage tree areas being identified by their species character even though they formed parts of a single tract. The naming of Margaret Sech, widow, as the southern boundary holder of the main parcel connects the Reder grant to the earlier Sech family inheritance arrangements. Margaret Sech had been the widow of Richard Swallow by her first marriage and the widow of Richard or John Sech by her second, and the Swallow to Sech conveyance of 4 February 1705 had transferred her son Richard Swallow's reversionary interest to her for £140 0s 0d. The current grant places her land adjacent to Reder's main parcel, confirming her continuing standing as a substantial holder in this part of the island. The boundary references to Gabriel Powell and Francis Wrangham as the western neighbours provide a further connection to the earlier records. Powell had been the major Chapel Valley land trader of the 1706 records, with his £350 0s 0d purchase from Hoskison and his earlier dealings at Peak Gult. The Francis Wrangham named here is probably the second Francis Wrangham of the records, the younger man who had appeared as witness to multiple transactions rather than the original 1682 inquest holder who had died and whose widow had remarried Henry Francis. The pattern shows the boundary descriptions preserving multiple generations of family names across the records. The one-acre cabbage tree parcel in Sandy Bay under the main ridge identifies a separate small holding adjacent to the established Sandy Bay tenures. The boundary references to Paul Charles, Richard Swallow and William Naughton connect the parcel to the 99-year leasehold that Charles had taken from Heath in March 1705, to the Deep Valley mansion house that Swallow had bought from Cole in June 1705, and to the western neighbour named in the Bagley lease of March 1711. The pattern shows the Sandy Bay tenures forming a network of named holdings that the formal confirmations were now bringing within the new tenure framework. John Long appears as the northern boundary holder of the main parcel. The Long name had appeared earlier in the records through the boundary description of the Richard Cleve sale of June 1715, in which the rebuilt James Valley house had been described as adjoining the house of John Long. The current reference to Long as a rural holder near Margaret Sech's land suggests that the Long household, like the Coulson and Reder families, held property across both urban and rural locations. |

|                    |                 |                   | The use of the cabbage tree designation, encountered earlier in the Doveton lease of 17 April 1711, confirms that the species name had been adopted as a standard term for the vegetation type. The cabbage tree, indigenous to the island, produced edible tips that were valued for fresh provisions, particularly for ship's victualling. The categorisation of land by reference to its cabbage tree cover reflects both the agricultural value of the species and the practical use of vegetation as a means of identifying parcels within the formal tenure system. The dating by reference to a consultation held on 30 May 1711 indicates that the council had continued its programme of confirmation hearings through the spring of 1711, with the procedural steps for each grant being completed over several weeks. The pattern shows the new tenure system being implemented as a sustained institutional exercise rather than a single event, with the council processing successive families' holdings through the established sequence of consultation, public notice and formal grant. Speculations The size of the Reder confirmation at forty-one acres, divided between the main thirty-two-acre parcel and the smaller one-acre Sandy Bay parcel, places the family among the more substantial inhabitants of the island. The combined estate would have supported a significant agricultural operation, with the gumwood providing timber and fuel and the cabbage tree areas supplying fresh provisions. The mechanism of consolidating these various parcels under a single confirmation gave the heir a documented title to the entire estate in a single instrument. The grouping of the gumwood and cabbage tree areas within a single boundary description, rather than treating each species type as a separate parcel, indicates that the council was prepared to confirm contiguous land as a single holding regardless of internal variations in vegetation. The mechanism would have simplified the documentary record and reduced the administrative burden of separate confirmations for each category of land, while preserving the institutional information about the character of different parts of the estate. The grant of the small one-acre Sandy Bay parcel alongside the much larger main parcel suggests that the Reder family held land across more than one part of the island. The mechanism of confirming all the family's holdings in a single grant, even when the parcels were geographically separate, would have given the heir a comprehensive title document covering the entire inherited estate. The structure points to the council's preference for resolving each family's tenure position in a single coordinated process rather than through multiple piecemeal confirmations. |

James Reder set his hand to the other part of the lease. It was signed in the presence of Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, fifth in council, and Thomas Greene, register. Matthew Bazett signed as executor. Interpretations The Company lease to James Reder of 9 June 1711 documents the now established practice of pairing a freehold confirmation with a separate leasehold over adjoining land. The forty-one-acre freehold confirmation sealed on the same day had covered the main inherited Reder estate, and the present five-acre leasehold of gumwood land adds a further parcel under the twenty-one-year tenure regime. The mechanism follows the precise pattern of the Doveton and Coulson grants of 17 April 1711, with the council using both freehold and leasehold instruments to settle a single family's combined tenure position. The rent structure of four shillings per acre plus one shilling duty applied to the five-acre Reder leasehold gives a total annual rent of twenty-one shillings, calculated as twenty shillings for the five acres at four shillings each plus one shilling duty. The figure stands well above the five shillings total imposed on the two-acre Coulson leasehold and on the eleven-acre Doveton leasehold. The per-acre rent of four shillings is uniform across the Coulson and Reder leases, while the Doveton lease had applied a much lower rate of approximately fivepence per acre on the gumwood. The disparity suggests that the Doveton rate was an exception or that the calculation basis differed between the leases. The boundary description identifies Reder's own land on the east and south, indicating that the five-acre leasehold parcel adjoined his confirmed freehold holding on two sides. The mechanism shows the leasehold filling out the borders of the freehold estate, with the additional parcel adding to the working area of the family's overall holding. The structure parallels the relationship between the Doveton freehold and leasehold parcels of April 1711, where the leasehold ground sat adjacent to the freehold confirmation. The signature of Matthew Bazett as executor at the foot of the lease introduces a procedural feature parallel to the role of Jonas Doveton as executor of the late Leonard Coulson's estate in the Coulson lease of 17 April 1711. Bazett's appearance as executor for the late James Reder shows him taking on a similar fiduciary responsibility for another planter family's estate. The pattern indicates that the small group of senior planters and council members served as executors for multiple estates, with men like Daniel Griffeth, Jonathan Doveton and Matthew Bazett appearing in this role across several different family arrangements. Bazett's combined role as fifth in council and executor of the Reder estate places him in a dual institutional and private capacity at the sealing of the lease. He attended the lease both as a council member confirming the formal grant and as the executor binding the estate on the lessee |

The structure raises an inherent question of conflict of interest, but the formal involvement of the other council members and the register provided the institutional cover for the arrangement. The mechanism shows the small literate circle on the island operating across multiple roles within a single transaction. The reduced council attendance at the lease, with only Daniel Griffeth and Matthew Bazett among the council members and Thomas Greene as register, follows the pattern of the Coulson lease of 17 April 1711. The formal grants under the new tenure system required the attestation of the senior council members, while the smaller leases were sealed in the presence of a minimum quorum. The structure shows the council distinguishing between the procedural requirements for the principal freehold grants and the supplementary leases, with the larger institutional weight reserved for the more substantial transactions. The repetition of the prohibition on disposal without consent of the governor and council, identical in form to the provision in the Bagley, Doveton and Coulson leases, confirms that the new tenure system consistently applied this institutional control to leasehold interests. The mechanism preserves the council's continuing oversight of who held the leased lands across all the families brought within the new framework. The structure shows the council systematically applying the same restrictions across the entire programme of leases issued under the new system. Speculations The granting of a five-acre leasehold to James Reder alongside his forty-one-acre freehold confirmation suggests that the council was distinguishing between the parcels that had a documented inheritance basis and those that required formal leasehold confirmation under the new system. The five acres may have been ground that the late James Reder had held under an informal arrangement or under an earlier leasehold that had now expired or required renewal. The mechanism gave the heir a comprehensive title across the entire working unit, with the freehold and leasehold instruments together covering forty-six acres of contiguous and adjacent land. The role of Matthew Bazett as executor of the late James Reder's estate provides additional context for his earlier appearances in the records. His accumulation of land at Sheel Valley and Deep Valley, his role as surveyor under warrants for the council, and his continuing presence as a witness across multiple transactions all fit within the picture of a senior figure trusted by other planter families with substantial fiduciary responsibilities. The mechanism shows how Bazett's standing as fifth in council was reinforced by his role as executor for at least one of the major free planter estates on the island. The uniform application of the four-shilling per-acre rent across the Coulson and Reder leases, in contrast to the much lower rate on the Doveton gumwood lease, suggests that the council had moved towards a standard per-acre rent for leasehold parcels of certain categories. The Doveton lease may have reflected an earlier or different calculation, perhaps tied to the particular history of the parcels or to specific arrangements between the council and Doveton. The mechanism points to the new tenure system developing more standardised rent structures as the programme of leases progressed, with the later leases applying more uniform rates than the earlier ones. |

The sum was paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Elinor acknowledged the payment and gave a full discharge. The land had formerly been the lot of the late John Cotgrave, free planter, and had passed to his eldest son Gilbert Cotgrave, who had held it in possession and occupation until his death. The parcel lay in a small valley called Youngs Valley, on the east of the island. It adjoined John Alexander's own land, formerly the lot of the late John Matthews and the late Onesiphorus Quinney. All the provisions then growing on the land passed with the parcel. Alexander and his heirs took the land and provisions to dispose of at their own will and pleasure. Elinor covenanted that Alexander and his successors would hold the parcel peacefully and quietly without hindrance, molestation, contradiction or interruption from her, her heirs, executors or administrators, or from any person acting through her. She bound herself to defend and keep Alexander and his heirs harmless from any encumbrance. The deed was made on 23 May 1712 and signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of John Coles and Isaac Wood. Elinor Cotgrave signed. Philipas Tovey certified the deed as a true copy in his capacity as register. Interpretations The Cotgrave to Alexander sale of 23 May 1712 documents the same transaction recorded in the earlier deed of similar substance, with this version providing additional details that the earlier rendering had not preserved. The recital here names the original holder as John Cotgrave rather than Tehu Cotgrave, confirming that the Tehu in the earlier deed was a transcription variant of the same name. The current deed therefore corrects the documentary record and identifies the original lot-holder definitively as John Cotgrave, the same man whose dealings appear elsewhere in the records. The identification of John Cotgrave as the original holder connects the Youngs Valley parcel to the earlier records of his other dealings. John Cotgrave had taken the 99-year lease of the Rhodes plantation from Elizabeth Rhodes on 27 October 1687 and had bought a Chapel Valley dwelling house from Thomas Tewsdale on 19 April 1694 for £35 12s 0d. The current deed adds the seventy-acre Youngs Valley lot to the recorded inventory of his holdings, and the structure shows John Cotgrave as one of |

The lot land passed to the eldest son as the principal heir, with the mother Margaret Cotgrave receiving other parts of the estate as widow and the younger children presumably being provided for in other ways. The mechanism gave the eldest son the core of the family's rural land, with the urban and leasehold holdings being distributed separately. The boundary description identifies John Alexander's own adjoining land as formerly the lot of the late John Matthews and the late Onesiphorus Quinney. The reference to two former holders for the adjoining parcel indicates that Alexander's land had been assembled from two separate original allotments, perhaps by purchase from successive owners or by inheritance through different lines. The 1682 inquest had recorded a John Mathews among the original allottees, and the current deed confirms that his lot had eventually come into Alexander's possession alongside the former Quinney parcel. The name Onesiphorus Quinney introduces a previously unrecorded original holder. The unusual first name Onesiphorus, taken from the New Testament, was a distinctive Puritan choice that places Quinney within the religious milieu of the early settlers. The earlier records had named a different Onesiphorus, Onesipherus Sheado, in the context of the John Robinson bond to pay the Sheado children their portions. The recurrence of the name across two separate families confirms its currency among the planter community of the late seventeenth century. Philipas Tovey's certification as register, with the spelling of his first name given here as Philipas, matches the Philip Tovey of the earlier Grandy to Alexander deed of November 1701 and the Philip Forsy of the Beale brothers' sales of February 1716. The succession of registers across the records reflects the transitions in the office during the period, with multiple men holding the position at different times. Tovey's appearance here in 1712 confirms his continuing role as register through the second decade of the eighteenth century. The witnesses John Coles and Isaac Wood do not appear elsewhere in the records reviewed so far. The John Coles named here is presumably the same as the John Coles who had appeared in earlier deeds as a free planter at the head of Fryer Valley, with his sale of ten acres to Thomas Goodwin in March 1696. The recurrence of the name across more than fifteen years would be consistent with the same man continuing as an established planter, and the choice of Coles as a witness to the Cotgrave to Alexander deed places him within the network of established figures supporting the transaction. The cash price of £90 0s 0d for the seventy acres works out at about £1 6s 0d per acre, which falls towards the lower end of the upland market established by the earlier deeds. The figure is consistent with the rate for substantial rural parcels on the east of the island, and the relative modesty of the price compared to the £7 0s 0d per acre rate of the Hoskison to Powell sale of September 1706 or the £4 6s 0d per acre rate of the Powell to Greentree sale of March 1703 suggests that the Youngs Valley land was viewed as less productive than the more central holdings. Speculations The 23 May 1712 dating of the deed places it about a year before the implementation of the new tenure system documented in the April 1711 consultation. The mechanism of recording the chain of ownership through specific predecessors, the warranty against encumbrances and the formal involvement of the register in certifying a true copy fit the pattern of property dealings under the new system. The structure suggests that the new tenure |

The mechanism would have left Elinor as the sole holder of the rural estate, and her decision to convert it into cash through the sale to Alexander reflects either a desire for liquidity or the absence of any continuing family interest in maintaining the rural holding. The £90 0s 0d would have given her substantial provision for her own remaining years. The acquisition by John Alexander of the seventy-acre Youngs Valley parcel, adjoining his existing land formed from the former Matthews and Quinney lots, gave him a consolidated rural estate of considerable size. The combined holdings would have totalled well over a hundred acres of upland on the east of the island, and the mechanism shows Alexander building a substantial personal estate alongside his institutional duties as register and clerk of the council. The structure reflects the pattern across the records of senior office-holders accumulating land through purchases at favourable prices, with their position within the registration system giving them both the information and the connections needed to identify and complete such acquisitions.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

The parcel was bounded as follows: North the land of Francis Wrangham.East the land of James Reder.South the land of John Bowman.West the Honourable Company's waste land, formerly held by John Lufkin. Powell's right and title to the fifty and a half acres had been confirmed by a consultation held on 30 May 1711. Notice had been given by beat of drum for any person to make a claim on a specified day, but no one had appeared and no objection had been made. Powell and his heirs took the premises for ever, on the following conditions: Allegiance to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Honourable Company and its successors. Obedience to law to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The grant was sealed under the Company's common seal at the Castle on the island on 9 June 1711. The plot and plan of the land were annexed to the grant, and a copy of the deed and plan was entered in the register book. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of John Roberts, governor, Edward Walkborne, deputy governor, William Marsden, third in council, Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, fifth in council, and Thomas Greene, register. Interpretations The Company confirmation to Gabriel Powell of 9 June 1711 documents one of the larger individual grants under the new tenure system. The fifty and a half acres of cabbage tree land form a substantial single holding, and the absence of any inheritance recital indicates that Powell held the land in his own right rather than as heir to a deceased predecessor. The mechanism shows the new tenure system being used to confirm the title of an established holder, with the formal grant giving documentary substance to an existing position. The boundary description connects the Powell parcel to several of the other holders confirmed in the spring |

Francis Wrangham appears as the northern neighbour, John Bowman as the southern, and the Company's waste land formerly held by John Lufkin as the western. The recital that the western boundary was formerly held by Lufkin connects the parcel to the 26 June 1707 bill of sale by which Lufkin had sold a dwelling house and thirty acres to the Company for £350 0s 0d in sterling. The mechanism shows the council preserving the documentary chain of earlier holdings even where the land had reverted to the Company. The fact that Powell received only a freehold confirmation, without an accompanying leasehold of adjoining cabbage tree or gumwood ground, distinguishes his treatment from the parallel Doveton, Coulson and Reder grants. The structure suggests that the Powell estate consisted entirely of land suitable for freehold confirmation under the new system, with no smaller adjoining parcels requiring leasehold treatment. The mechanism reflects the council's flexibility in applying the new tenure framework to the particular circumstances of each holder's estate. The reference to fifty and a half acres of cabbage tree land identifies the parcel as a single category of vegetation. The earlier grants to Doveton and Reder had split their holdings between cabbage tree and gumwood areas, with the council distinguishing between the two species in the documentary record. The Powell parcel as wholly cabbage tree land indicates either that the entire fifty and a half acres bore that vegetation type or that the council was applying the dominant category as a single descriptor regardless of any minor internal variations. Gabriel Powell's earlier dealings across the records establish him as a major land trader and substantial holder. His same-day purchase from George Hoskison on 11 May 1704 of twenty acres at Peak Gult for £32 0s 0d and onward sale to Robert Gurling for £100 0s 0d, his £350 0s 0d acquisition of dwelling house and fifty acres from Hoskison on 7 September 1706, his sale of twenty acres to James Greentree on 11 March 1703 for £86 0s 0d, his arrangement with James Sich over the disputed Beale parcel in December 1707, and his appearance as witness to multiple transactions all confirm his position as one of the more active figures in the records. The fifty and a half acres confirmed here in June 1711 may include or overlap with the fifty acres bought from Hoskison in September 1706, although the precise relationship between the parcels cannot be established without further documentary evidence. The mechanism of the new tenure system was to confirm existing holdings rather than to create new ones, and the Powell confirmation here represents the council giving formal effect to a holding that the family had assembled through earlier transactions. The continuity between Powell's documented purchases and the present confirmation shows how the new tenure system worked to formalise the existing pattern of land ownership. The naming of John Bowman as the southern neighbour connects the parcel to the Bowman family that had appeared in the earlier records through the boundary description of the Orlando Bagley senior gift of August 1695, where Bowman had been identified as the eastern neighbour at the head of Chapel Valley. The John Bowman of the present 1711 grant is presumably the same family, perhaps the same man or a successor of the same name, and the recurrence of the surname across more than fifteen years confirms the family's continuing presence as a substantial holder. Francis Wrangham as the northern neighbour identifies the second-generation Wrangham of the records. The original Francis Wrangham of the 1682 inquest had died and his widow had remarried Henry Francis, and the present Francis Wrangham is probably his |

The pattern shows the Wrangham name persisting as a recognised holder across two or more generations, with the boundary descriptions in the deeds preserving the family identification. Speculations The lack of an accompanying leasehold for Powell, in contrast to the Doveton, Coulson and Reder grants of the same period, suggests that the entirety of his holding had a clear documentary basis under the freehold confirmation framework. The mechanism would have been to confirm only the parcels with established title, leaving any informally held adjoining ground to be regularised under separate leasehold arrangements if necessary. The Powell estate may therefore have had a more straightforward documentary history than the inherited estates of the other freeholders, with fewer informal or contested margins requiring leasehold formalisation. The size of the Powell confirmation at fifty and a half acres in a single parcel places his holding among the largest individual grants under the 1711 programme. The Doveton fifty and a quarter acres had been divided across three separate parcels, and the Reder forty-one acres had been split between a main thirty-two-acre block and a small one-acre Sandy Bay parcel. The Powell parcel as a single fifty-and-a-half-acre block represents a more compact and continuous holding, which would have been more efficient to manage as a single agricultural unit and more straightforward to demarcate by the fencing required under the new tenure regime. The continuing presence of the Wrangham, Bowman and Reder names as the boundaries of the Powell parcel illustrates how the new tenure system mapped existing patterns of land ownership rather than imposing a new geography. The mechanism preserved the established arrangement of holdings, with the council documenting the position rather than reorganising it. The structure points to the new tenure system as an exercise in formalisation rather than in redistribution, with the council's role being to give institutional form to the patterns of ownership that had already developed on the ground.  |

Captain George Haswell signed and sealed. Interpretations The Company lease to Captain George Haswell of 7 May 1717 documents the operation of the new tenure system six years after its initial implementation in the spring of 1711. The same twenty-one-year term, the four-shilling per-acre rent plus one-shilling duty, the fencing requirement and the restriction on disposal all appear in the same form as in the earlier Doveton, Coulson and Reder leases. The mechanism shows the institutional framework continuing to function unchanged across the intervening years, with the same standard provisions being applied to successive grants. The new feature of the Haswell lease is the explicit requirement to plant ten fruit trees per acre inside the fences, with plantains and papaya trees counted within that total. The provision sets a minimum density of sixty fruit trees across the six-acre parcel, and the inclusion of plantains and papayas indicates the council's acceptance of these large herbaceous plants as functional equivalents to true fruit trees for the purposes of the requirement. The mechanism shows the council using the lease as a tool of agricultural policy, directing the lessee to develop the parcel in a particular productive direction rather than leaving the choice of land use entirely to the lessee. The associated requirement to maintain the existing tree population, replacing those cut down, used or lost to natural causes, gives the lease an active conservation component. The council was concerned not merely with the present condition of the land but with its long-term productive capacity, and the obligation to replace lost trees ensures that the woodland resource is preserved across the term of the lease. The mechanism reflects an institutional awareness of the dependence of the island's economy on its tree cover and a concern to protect that cover against the cumulative depletion that uncontrolled cutting could cause. Captain George Haswell's identification as deputy governor places him in a senior institutional position. The earlier records had named Edward Walkborne as deputy governor, with his appearance across the 1708, 1709 and 1711 transactions. The current lease shows that Haswell had succeeded to the office by May 1717, and the structure indicates the natural turnover of |

The presence of the deputy governor as a lessee of Company land, in the same institutional pattern as Goodwin and Roberts before him, confirms that senior officers continued to acquire personal interests in island land alongside their official roles. The reference to Haswell's own ten acres of free land as the northern neighbour of the leased six acres shows that he held a freehold parcel in Sandy Bay before taking the leasehold. The combination of freehold and leasehold land within a single estate, with the lease adjoining and extending the freehold, follows the pattern seen in the earlier Doveton and Coulson grants. The mechanism gave Haswell a consolidated holding of sixteen acres in Sandy Bay, combining the security of the freehold with the additional area of the leasehold. The witnessing of the lease by William Alexander, with no other witnesses named, marks a departure from the standard pattern of multiple council members attending the sealing. The earlier leases had been witnessed by at least Daniel Griffeth, Matthew Bazett and the register Thomas Greene. The current lease has only William Alexander, who may be the same man who appeared in the records as Richard Alexander's witness role or as a relative of the principal John Alexander. The reduced formal attestation may reflect changes in the council's procedures by 1717 or particular circumstances on the day of the sealing. The reference to the regnal year of King George places the lease in the reign that had begun on the death of Queen Anne in August 1714. The 1717 dating sits about three years into George's reign, and the substitution of his name for that of Queen Anne in the allegiance clause follows the established practice of updating the formula on each accession. The structure shows the registry continuing to track the metropolitan succession. The provision that plantains and papayas were to be counted within the ten fruit trees per acre, but not in addition to them, indicates that the council was willing to accept the cultivation of these species as fulfilling the planting requirement. Plantains and papayas grow quickly and produce fruit within a few years, and their inclusion as eligible plantings would have made the requirement easier for the lessee to fulfil. The mechanism reflects an institutional balance between the desire to promote tree planting and the practical reality of what could be grown effectively on the island. The institutional concern with maintaining tree cover, expressed both in the maintenance requirement and in the fruit tree planting obligation, reflects a particular feature of the island's environment. The relatively limited area of St Helena, combined with the demands of ship's victualling, construction and fuel, would have made forest depletion a real risk. The mechanism of using leases to require both maintenance and planting shows the council using its tenure system as an active tool for forest management, with the planters serving as the practical custodians of the woodland resource under institutional supervision. Speculations The introduction of the fruit tree planting requirement, not present in the earlier 1711 leases, suggests that the council had identified the need to encourage agricultural development on leased parcels through the formal mechanism of the lease itself. The mechanism would have been a response either to general concerns about food supply on the island or to particular pressure from the Company's central administration to increase the productive output of leased land. The structure shows the new tenure system evolving over time, with the council adding new |

Plantains and papayas could be planted as cuttings or seedlings and would begin producing within a couple of years, in contrast to the longer establishment time of fruit trees grown from seed. The mechanism would have allowed the lessee to meet the planting requirement quickly and to begin generating produce from the land sooner than a strict requirement for fruit trees alone would have allowed. Haswell's combination of a six-acre leasehold with his existing ten-acre freehold in Sandy Bay points to a deliberate strategy of building a consolidated working estate in that part of the island. The mechanism follows the pattern of earlier senior officers, including Goodwin's accumulation across Fryer Valley, Little Horsepad and Chapel Valley, and Walkborne's mortgage taking over Smiths Plain. The structure reflects the consistent pattern of senior council members using their position to assemble substantial personal estates alongside their institutional duties.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |

The parcel was bounded as follows: North the land of Thomas Burnham.East the land of Thomas Burnham.West the Honourable Company's waste land.South the main ridge and the land of John Alexander. Jeffrey's right and title to the twenty-two acres had been confirmed by a consultation held on 22 February 1709. Notice had been given by beat of drum for any person to make a claim on a specified day, but no one had appeared and no objection had been made. Jeffrey and his heirs took the premises for ever, on the following conditions: Allegiance to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Honourable Company and its successors.Obedience to law to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The grant was sealed under the Company's common seal at the Castle on the island on 9 June 1711. The plot and plan of the land were annexed to the grant, and a copy of the deed and plan was entered in the register book. It was sealed and delivered in the presence of John Roberts, governor, Edward Walkborne, deputy governor, William Marsden, third in council, Daniel Griffeth, fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, fifth in council, and Thomas Greene, register. Interpretations The Company confirmation to Samuel Jeffrey of 9 June 1711 documents the twenty-two acres at the head of Fishers Valley that Jeffrey had bought from Thomas Toster on 12 April 1709 for £80 0s 0d. The mechanism of the new tenure system was to confirm existing holdings through the consultation procedure, and the present grant gives Jeffrey a documented freehold title to the parcel he had acquired by purchase a little over two years earlier. The structure shows the new system formalising recent acquisitions in the same way as it formalised inherited holdings. The 1709 Toster sale had identified the parcel as twenty-two acres at the head of Fishery Valley adjoining the lands of Thomas Beurnham and Simon Whaley, with the recital that it had formerly belonged to the late Edward Heath and had passed to Toster under Heath's will. The current confirmation identifies Thomas Burnham as both |

The Simon Whaley of the 1709 deed does not appear in the present boundary description, suggesting either that the Whaley land had passed to another holder or that the boundary line had been adjusted between the two transactions. The southern boundary of the main ridge and John Alexander's land introduces Alexander as a neighbouring holder at Fishers Valley. Alexander's accumulation of rural land across the records includes his 26 November 1701 purchase from James Grandy of ten acres adjoining Margaret Cotgrave, his 23 May 1712 purchase from Elinor Cotgrave of seventy acres at Youngs Valley, and now this appearance as the southern neighbour to Jeffrey's twenty-two acres at the head of Fishers Valley. The mechanism shows Alexander holding land across multiple valleys on the east of the island, with the Fishers Valley parcel forming part of a broader rural estate. The consultation date of 22 February 1709 stands earlier than the date of any other recorded confirmation hearing in this set. The Doveton and Coulson confirmations of April 1711 had been based on consultations of 13 and 31 March 1711, and the Powell, Reder and Jeffrey confirmations of June 1711 had relied on consultations of 30 May 1711. The Jeffrey confirmation, however, references a consultation more than two years earlier, in February 1709. The discrepancy suggests either that the Jeffrey claim had been heard at an early stage of the tenure regularisation process and had then been held in abeyance until the formal grants of June 1711, or that the 1709 date was an error in the recording of the deed. The size of the Jeffrey holding at twenty-two acres places him among the substantial planters confirmed in the June 1711 programme. His acquisition by purchase from Toster, rather than by inheritance, distinguishes him from Doveton, Coulson and Reder, who had all received confirmations of inherited holdings. The mechanism shows the new tenure system applying the same procedural framework to both purchased and inherited holdings, with the consultation hearing and public notice procedure being used to confirm the title regardless of how the land had come into the holder's hands. The identification of the parcel as wholly cabbage tree land, without any gumwood designation, indicates that the Fishers Valley land at this point bore a single vegetation category. The earlier Powell confirmation of fifty and a half acres had also been identified as wholly cabbage tree land, in contrast to the Reder and Doveton confirmations that had split their holdings between cabbage tree and gumwood designations. The mechanism shows the council applying the vegetation category to each parcel based on its actual cover, with single-category designations used where the parcel was uniform in its tree composition. The pattern of senior officers from the council attending the sealing of the Jeffrey grant, with John Roberts as governor, Edward Walkborne as deputy governor, William Marsden, Daniel Griffeth and Matthew Bazett as the third, fourth and fifth in council, and Thomas Greene as register, matches the attestation of the other major freehold confirmations of April and June 1711. The mechanism shows the council giving full institutional weight to each freehold confirmation, with the formal involvement of the entire governing body underscoring the seriousness of the new tenure system. The recital that no claim had been made in response to the public notice by beat of drum follows the standard procedure across the 1711 confirmations. The mechanism gave the proceedings a formal evidentiary basis, with the absence of any objection treated as institutional acceptance of the holder's title. The structure shows the council using the public notice procedure as a means of resolving potential challenges before issuing the formal |

The mechanism would have involved early hearings of particular claims as they arose, with the formal framework being put in place later to systematise what had previously been a more episodic process. The structure points to the new tenure system as a development of existing practice rather than a wholly new institutional creation. The acquisition of the Fishers Valley parcel by purchase rather than by inheritance, and its confirmation under the same procedural framework as the inherited holdings, indicates that the new tenure system was designed to handle all forms of land title rather than only inheritance cases. The mechanism gave purchasers the same institutional protection as inheritors, and the structure shows the council applying a uniform standard of documentary confirmation regardless of how the holder had come into possession of the land. Samuel Jeffrey's acquisition of the twenty-two acres from Toster in April 1709, followed by the formal confirmation in June 1711, gave him a settled position as a major freeholder at the head of Fishers Valley. The £80 0s 0d he had paid for the parcel reflected a substantial commitment to the area, and the confirmation gave his investment the documentary security needed to support further development. The mechanism shows the new tenure system creating the institutional conditions under which capital invested in land could be protected and made productive over the longer term.  |

Public notice was given by beat of drum on a fixed day for any person to enter a claim, and no claim or objection was made. The land was granted to Henry Francis and his heirs and assigns for ever, on condition that they bore true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and obeyed all the laws and constitutions of the island. The plan of the land was annexed to the deed, and a copy was entered in the register book. The Company set its common seal at the Castle in the island on 9 June 1711, in the presence of John Roberts governor, Edward Walkborne deputy governor, William Marsden third in council, Daniel Griffeth fourth in council, Matthew Bazett fifth in council, and Thomas Greene register. Interpretations The phrase Lords Proprietors identifies the Company in its capacity as territorial overlord of the island rather than as a commercial enterprise. The same body confirmed grants, took rents and adjudicated title, fusing landlord and government into a single institution. Confirmation rather than fresh grant suggests Francis already held the land in practice. The instrument of 9 June 1711 regularised existing occupation by routing it through the formal procedure put in place under the consultation of 6 April 1711, which required all inhabitants to secure documented title within a fixed period. Francis's confirmation belongs to the same series as the Doveton, Coulson and Reder confirmations of April and June 1711. Beat of drum notice operated as the public claim procedure. Silence on the appointed day extinguished any rival interest and rendered title indefeasible against undisclosed claimants. The mechanism transferred the cost of asserting competing rights onto rival claimants while leaving the holder protected by inaction. The conditional clause requiring true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne and obedience to island laws made tenure contingent on political loyalty. Forfeiture for disobedience remained available to the Company as the underlying sanction, giving the grant the character of a political instrument as well as a property title. The annexed plan and the register entry created a triple record (deed, plan, register), reducing dependence on a single document and making the title verifiable across institutional sources. Thomas Greene's signature as register confirms the succession to John Alexander in that office. The graduated council signatures, numbered third, fourth and fifth in council, reproduce the formal hierarchy of the governing body and place the instrument among those treated as sufficiently substantial to require the full quorum rather than the reduced panel used for ordinary leases. The boundary description draws on neighbouring holders already established in earlier records: Francis Wrangham (on three of the parcels), Margaret Sech widow, Gabriel Powell, John Bagley and John Bowman's orphans. Francis Wrangham reappearing as a boundary holder on three sides of Henry Francis's land reinforces the longstanding territorial link between the two families, Francis having earlier married the widow of an earlier Francis Wrangham. John Bowman's orphans as a named boundary holder records adult mortality among free planters of the previous |

Routing the confirmation through the new 1711 procedure converted what had probably begun as informal occupation derived from the marriage portion into a secured freehold defensible against any later challenge by Wrangham heirs. The absence of an accompanying leasehold grant, in contrast to the same-day pairings given to Doveton, Coulson and Reder, points to Francis already holding sufficient land for his purposes and seeking only confirmation of existing parcels rather than expansion. The 1711 programme treated each holder's portfolio individually, calibrating freehold confirmation and new leasehold to particular household circumstances rather than applying a uniform package.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

The parcel was bounded to the north by the Company's waste land, to the east by Francis's own gumwood land, to the south by the land of Francis Wrangham, and to the west by the Company's waste land. The lease ran to Henry Francis and his executors, administrators and assigns for 21 years from 25 March 1711. Francis and his successors were required to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The annual rent was 5s 0d per annum, made up of 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty, payable in good and current island money on Lady Day, 25 March. At the end of the term Francis was to leave the fences in as good repair as at the start. He was not to alter the fences, which served as the legal landmarks of the parcel and as the basis for the plan annexed to the lease. He was not to dispose of the lease or his interest in it without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time. The Company set its common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 9 June 1711, and Henry Francis set his hand to the counterpart. The instrument was witnessed by Daniel Griffith fourth in council, Matthew Bazett fifth in council and Thomas Greene register. Interpretations The pairing of this lease with Francis's same-day freehold confirmation places him within the same April to |

The combined package extended a holder's working estate beyond the freehold core through Company leasehold, while keeping the leasehold subject to closer institutional control. The rent of 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty matches the standard rate fixed by the 1711 framework for the leasing of gumwood land. The 1s 0d duty was a flat administrative charge separated from the per-acre rent, distinguishing the price of use from the cost of recording and oversight. Payment on Lady Day, 25 March, aligned the island rent year with the metropolitan quarter day. The chosen rendering of the date as the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary preserved the older ecclesiastical formula even though the substance was secular rent collection. The covenant to leave the fences as found and the prohibition on altering them gave the fences the status of legal landmarks. Their function went beyond physical enclosure: they fixed the boundary against which the annexed plan could be verified at any time during the term, and any alteration would have undermined the documentary basis of the lease. The prohibition on disposing of the lease without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time marks a substantial departure from earlier 99-year leases, such as the 1687 Rhodes plantation lease, which had been freely assignable. The 1711 framework retained institutional control over the identity of the tenant and prevented unsupervised circulation of leasehold interests through informal sale, marriage or inheritance. The witness panel, reduced to the fourth and fifth in council with the register, matches the practice that smaller leases required only a partial quorum, while the matching freehold confirmation of the same day carried the full governor and council signatures. The instrument hierarchy was thus reflected in the witnessing hierarchy. The 25-acre parcel adjoined Francis's own gumwood land on the east, attaching the new leasehold directly to his existing freehold and producing a continuous working block. The arrangement minimised access and fencing problems and consolidated his northern frontier against Company waste. Francis's signature in his own hand, set to the counterpart of the lease, marks him as among the literate free planters whose signatures rather than marks appear on the instruments. The contrast with the many marks recorded across earlier deeds places him within the small literate circle that included Goodwin, Alexander, Griffeth, Bazett and Greene. Speculations Securing the 25-acre leasehold immediately east of his confirmed freehold, on the same day as the confirmation itself, suggests a coordinated strategy to lock in both the title to existing land and the right to a further block of uncultivated gumwood before the 1711 programme moved on to other holders. Treating freehold and leasehold as a single transaction maximised the area Francis could draw within his fenced perimeter at one administrative pass. The choice of gumwood land for the leasehold extension, rather than the cabbage tree land that featured in two of his three confirmed freehold parcels, points to a deliberate split between higher-value land held in freehold and timber or pasture ground taken on the 21-year term. Land carrying long-term tree value was kept under freehold for stability, while gumwood ground useful for present grazing or wood-cutting was acquired on the shorter institutional tenure. |

The parcel lay on the east part of the island, at or near the head of Woody Ridge, commonly known as Sexton's Ground. The land was bounded to the north by 30 acres of gumwood land in the possession and occupation of John Alexander, his father, to the south and east by several parcels in the possession of Robert Bell, planter and mason, and to the west by the land of Isaac Wood, cooper. The lease ran to William Alexander and his executors, administrators and assigns for 21 years from 25 March 1717. Alexander and his successors were required to bear true faith and allegiance to King George, his heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The annual rent was 5s 0d per annum, made up of 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty, payable in good and current island money on Lady Day, 25 March. Alexander bound himself to maintain the existing tree population on the parcel, replacing any trees cut down, used, or lost by age or high winds, so that the number of standing and growing trees was preserved. He was also to plant trees along the inside of every fence, and a further 10 fruit trees per acre of land, with plantains and fig trees not counted within that number. At the end of the 21-year term he was to leave the fences in good repair. Once the land was sufficiently fenced and secured, no fence was to be altered without prior leave, as the fences served as the legal landmarks of the parcel and as the basis of the plan annexed to the lease after measurement. He was not to dispose of the lease or his interest in it without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time. The Company set its common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 7 May 1717, and William Alexander set his hand and seal to the counterpart. The instrument was witnessed by John Alexander. Interpretations The description of the lessee as single man and inhabitant fixed his civil status for the purpose of the grant. Marital status carried administrative weight because it determined whether a wife's joinder or future widow's claim could affect the tenure. Recording Alexander as unmarried at execution closed off any later assertion of a marital interest predating the lease. The location at the head of Woody Ridge, identified by the local name Sexton's Ground, illustrates the persistence of working bynames for parcels alongside the formal surveying terminology of the 1711 framework. |

The placement extended the Alexander household holding southward by 15 acres without breaking the continuity of the family block, while keeping the new ground on the more restricted institutional tenure of the 21-year lease. Robert Bell's status as planter and mason and Isaac Wood's status as cooper are recorded in the boundary clause, an unusual departure from the simpler boundary references in most earlier instruments. The notation captures the artisanal layer within the free planter category and shows how skilled trades operated alongside cultivation on the same parcels. The reign of King George marks the metropolitan succession after the death of Queen Anne in August 1714. Allegiance clauses were updated with each new reign, and the change in formula carried legal weight because forfeiture for breach of allegiance remained the residual sanction underpinning Company tenure. The conservation covenant goes well beyond the standard 1711 fence-maintenance clause. Alexander was bound to keep the existing tree population intact by replacement, to plant trees along all internal fence lines, and to plant 10 fruit trees per acre. The express exclusion of plantains and figs from the fruit-tree count tightened the obligation. The Company treated the parcel as a productive asset whose tree cover was to be expanded under contractual obligation, not merely preserved. The same conservation framework had been imposed three weeks earlier on Captain George Haswell's Sandy Bay gumwood lease of 7 May 1717. Application of the same terms to William Alexander on the same day indicates a system-wide tightening of the leasehold framework in 1717, beyond the original 1711 standard. The fences again carried dual legal and physical function. Their role as landmarks tied them to the annexed plan, while the requirement to plant trees along their inside line gave them an additional ecological function as windbreaks and as boundaries within which young fruit trees would be sheltered. The disposal restriction reproduced the standard 1711 clause requiring the consent of the governor and council to any assignment. The provision kept the identity of the tenant under institutional control and prevented the leasehold from circulating through informal sale or inheritance. John Alexander's appearance as sole witness is striking given his earlier role as register from 1686 and the long succession to Thomas Greene, Philip Forsy and Philipas Tovey. Acting in his personal capacity as father of the lessee, rather than as register, John Alexander used the form of attestation to lend the family stature to the boundary description that named him as the adjoining holder. Speculations Taking the lease as a single man, immediately south of his father's existing 30 acres, suggests William Alexander was being launched as an independent householder while the family block remained intact. The 21-year term gave him a sufficient horizon to establish himself, while leaving the underlying land in the Company's hands rather than transferring freehold to a young man not yet married. The high specificity of the tree planting requirement on William's parcel, with plantains and figs expressly excluded from the fruit-tree count, points to an institutional concern that lessees would otherwise satisfy the requirement with fast-growing or low-value species. The exclusion forced the lessee to plant durable fruit trees of the kind required for ship victualling, and shows the Company actively shaping the agricultural mix on its leased ground rather than simply collecting rent. |

It strengthened the documentary record of the father-son boundary by placing the father's signature on the very instrument that defined it, while sparing the council the routine attendance required for a single-parcel lease of moderate size.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

Public notice was given by beat of drum on a fixed day for any person to enter a claim, and no claim or objection was made. The land was granted to Grace Coulson and her heirs and assigns for ever, on condition that they bore true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and obeyed all the laws and constitutions of the island. The Company set its common seal at the Castle on 23 June 1711. The plan of the land was annexed to the deed, and a copy was entered in the register book. The instrument was witnessed by John Roberts governor, Edward Mashborne deputy governor, William Marden second in council, Daniel Griffith fourth in council, Matthew Bazett fifth in council, and Thomas [...reev[...]] as register, with the surname of the register partly illegible in the manuscript. Interpretations Confirmation of a freehold to a widow in her own name marks her capacity to hold land independently rather than through a male trustee or remarriage. Grace Coulson's standing under the 1711 framework places her alongside Margaret Cotgrave, Elinor Cotgrave, Margaret Sech and the widow of Francis Wrangham as substantial widows whose tenure was secured in the same series of confirmations. The consultation date of 30 March 1699 stands more than 12 years earlier than the date of the confirmation itself. The 1711 programme reached back to existing administrative determinations from the 1690s and brought them within the new documentary regime, rather than re-adjudicating title from scratch. The beat of drum notice operated as the public claim procedure used across the 1711 confirmations. The boundary description of the gumwood parcel includes both Benoney Coulson and the orphans of Leonard Coulson as adjoining holders. Grace Coulson, Benoney Coulson and the late Leonard Coulson's children together represent at least three branches or generations of the Coulson family holding contiguous ground on the east side of the island. The family had previously appeared in connection with Mrs Grace Coulson as a boundary holder in the 1700 Edmunds-Goodwin Chapel Valley deed, with late Leonard Coulson as the earlier owner of the slave Sue, and with the orphans of Leonard Coulson as a boundary in the 1711 Doveton grant. The Two Gun Ridge boundary is a working byname tied to defensive emplacement and reinforces the survival of military topographical markers in civilian land descriptions. |

|                    |                 |                   | The boundaries of the cabbage tree parcel place Grace Coulson's land between Robert Marsh and William Marsh on the north and east sides and the children of Jonathan Beale on the south and west. The same Marsh father and son who had earlier passed the Edward Gardener inheritance through Dufton and Dweight here appear as neighbours within a confirmed framework rather than as parties to onward sale. The Beale children's appearance as boundary holders on two sides reproduces the orphan presence noted in the 1707 Lemon Garden lease (the Beale orphans' Purslane Bed) and the 1707 disputed Beale parcel let to James Sich. The conditional clause requiring true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne and obedience to island laws gave the Company the residual sanction of forfeiture for disobedience and preserved the political character of the tenure alongside its property character. The witness panel records William Mauden as second in council, an elevation from the third in council position attached to him in the records of 1708 and 1709. The promotion places him in the senior tier alongside Walkborne, who appears here as Mashborne in a clear variant of Walkborne, the deputy governor. The graduated council signatures together represent the full senior quorum normally reserved for freehold confirmations rather than the reduced panel attached to leases. The annexed plan and the register copy together create the triple record of deed, plan and register entry that was characteristic of the 1711 documentation regime, designed to make the title verifiable across independent institutional sources. Speculations The reach-back to a 1699 consultation rather than to a fresh hearing under the 1711 programme suggests Grace Coulson's title was treated as well-established and uncontested, with the formal confirmation acting principally to bring an older administrative finding within the new documentary framework. The 12-year gap between determination and confirmation indicates an order of business in 1711 that prioritised regularisation of long-standing holdings before turning to newer or disputed parcels. The contiguity of three Coulson holdings (Grace, Benoney and the orphans of Leonard) within a single boundary description points to a deliberate family pattern of clustered tenure on the east side, perhaps maintained through deliberate disposition by an earlier Coulson generation to keep the working block within close kin. Routing each parcel through individual confirmation in 1711 preserved the cluster while assigning the separate titles needed to protect each share against future remarriages, inheritance disputes and orphan claims. The cabbage tree parcel placed between the Marsh and Beale families positioned Grace Coulson at the meeting point of two further established east-side households. Confirmation of her title within that crowded boundary fixed the precise lines between three families' holdings at one administrative pass, removing the latent risk of dispute that would otherwise have grown as each family's next generation came of age. |

Public notice was given by beat of drum on a fixed day for any person to enter a claim, and no claim or objection was made. The land was granted to Grace Coulson and her heirs and assigns for ever, on condition that they bore true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and obeyed all the laws and constitutions of the island. The Company set its common seal at the Castle on 23 June 1711. The plan of the land was annexed to the deed, and a copy of both the deed and the plan was entered in the register book. The instrument was witnessed by John Roberts governor, Edward Mashborne deputy governor, William Marden third in council, Daniel Griffeth fourth in council, Matthew Bazett fifth in council, and Thomas [...ree...] as register. Interpretations The issue of two separate confirmation deeds to Grace Coulson on the same day, with the same witnesses, treated each parcel as a distinct unit of title rather than consolidating the whole 40-acre holding into a single document. The choice preserves the integrity of the individual plans annexed to each deed and keeps the documentary record tied to the boundaries on the ground rather than to the holder's overall estate. The northern boundary of the present parcel against Grace Coulson's own lot land, a parcel previously confirmed in the earlier deed of the same day, fixes a continuous block of Coulson freehold running northward from Two Gun Ridge. The configuration extends the family's east-side concentration beyond the cluster of Coulson, Benoney Coulson and the late Leonard Coulson's orphans noted in the earlier deed. The reference to lot land identifies the adjoining parcel as Coulson's own freehold within the original allotment system, distinguishing it from later acquisitions or leasehold ground. The term carries documentary weight because it ties the present parcel to the earlier confirmed block through an identifiable category of tenure rather than by mere physical adjacency. Two Gun Ridge reappears as the eastern boundary, fixing the same defensive emplacement as the marker for both Coulson parcels. The repeated use of the byname across two separate deeds anchors the entire Coulson |

The configuration suggests progressive expansion of Coulson tenure outward from an established core, with each new parcel sanctioned through formal confirmation rather than informal occupation. The witness panel reproduces the senior council quorum used in the earlier same-day confirmation, with the single substantive change being the position of William Maunden as third in council rather than second. The variation between the two deeds, both signed in the same sitting, points to a working hierarchy within the council that was not rigidly fixed at every signature but was recorded according to the order in which members signed each instrument. Such fluidity in numbering is consistent with the practice that the order of seniority below the deputy governor was understood by those present but not invariably set down with strict numerical consistency. The 1699 consultation date again precedes the 1711 confirmation by more than 12 years, placing this parcel within the same body of administrative determinations brought forward into the new documentary regime under the post-1711 reform. Speculations The decision to recognise the further 10 acres as a separate confirmation rather than as part of the existing 30-acre grant suggests the parcel was administratively distinct, perhaps acquired or determined at a later stage even though both stemmed from the same 1699 consultation. The separate plan annexed to each deed kept the surveying record neat and avoided the cartographic complication of representing one freehold composed of disjoint pieces under a single instrument. The position of the parcel against Company waste on two sides marks it as a frontier of cultivation, with Coulson's freehold acting as the line beyond which Company ground remained unenclosed. Securing freehold confirmation at that boundary in 1711 protected against any later Company decision to lease the adjoining waste to a different holder whose use might encroach on the established Coulson block.  |

And She the said Grace Coulson, To the other part hath Sett her Hand and Seale. her Signed and Delivered in Grace Coulson the Presence of U's marke Daniel G[riffeth] 4[th] in Council Matthew Ba[z]ett Thomas [...ree[...]] Register | obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The annual rent was 5s 0d per annum, made up of 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty, payable in good and current island money on Lady Day, 25 March. At the end of the 21-year term she was to leave the fences in as good repair as at the start. The fences served as her legal landmarks and as the basis for the plan annexed to the lease, and were not to be altered. She was not to dispose of the lease or her interest in it without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time. The Company set its common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 23 June 1711, and Grace Coulson set her mark and seal to the counterpart. The instrument was witnessed by Daniel Griffeth fourth in council, Matthew Bazett, and Thomas [...ree[...]] as register. Interpretations The pairing of this lease with Coulson's two same-day freehold confirmations completes the institutional pattern of the 1711 framework, by which a holder's title to existing parcels was confirmed in freehold while further expansion was channelled through 21-year leasehold subject to Company oversight. Coulson's combined portfolio thus reached 45 acres on a single day: 40 acres of confirmed freehold and 5 acres of leasehold. The boundary description records Benony Coulson as deceased, fixing his death between the earlier same-day freehold deed (in which his land was named without that qualification) and the issue of this lease. The reading is more probably explained by the leased parcel adjoining a different stretch of Benony Coulson's former holding now treated as part of the unallocated ground, since separate clerks copying separate instruments in close succession would not vary the form unless the underlying status of the boundary holder differed. The mark rather than a signature places Grace Coulson among the unlettered holders whose tenure was nonetheless secured by the same institutional apparatus that protected literate freeholders. Her ability to assert and defend an estate of 45 acres through the formal process, without herself being able to write, illustrates the reach of the documentary regime beyond the literate circle. The witness panel is reduced from the senior council quorum that attended the same-day freehold confirmations. The full governor and deputy governor signatures present on the freehold deeds drop away, leaving the fourth in council, the fifth in council and the register. The pattern matches the practice that leases required only a partial attendance while freehold confirmations carried the full senior quorum, even where both were executed in the same sitting. The rent of 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty matches the standard rate applied to gumwood land under the 1711 framework. Coulson's 5 acres at 5s 0d per annum bring the rent to a flat sum equal to the per-acre rate, demonstrating how the duty was structured to produce a meaningful charge even on small parcels. The disposal restriction requiring the consent of the governor and council reproduces the standard 1711 clause and keeps the leasehold under institutional supervision. For a widow holding land in her own right, the restriction also operates as protection against pressure to assign the lease in connection with any future remarriage, since the council's consent would interpose between her household and any new husband's attempt to consolidate the family estate. The fences again function as legal landmarks rather than mere physical enclosure, tying the lease to the annexed plan and giving the documentary record a verifiable reference on the ground at any point during the 21-year term. Speculations Taking the leasehold extension on the same day as the freehold confirmations completed a single coordinated |

The choice to seek both confirmation and new leasehold together avoided the cost and delay of a second appearance before the council and used the senior quorum already assembled for the freehold business. The placement of the leasehold parcel adjacent to land formerly held by Benony Coulson suggests Grace Coulson was extending the family block into ground that had recently fallen out of Coulson hands, perhaps on Benony's death without an immediate male heir in possession. Securing the parcel on a 21-year lease preserved the family's effective control of the area without requiring a freehold grant the Company might have been less ready to make on disputed family ground.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

Public notice was given by beat of drum on a fixed day for any person to enter a claim, and no claim or objection was made. The land was granted to Matthew Bazett and his heirs and assigns for ever, on condition that they bore true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and obeyed all the laws and constitutions of the island. The Company set its common seal at the Castle on 23 June 1711. The plan of the land was annexed to the deed, and a copy of both the deed and the plan was entered in the register book. The instrument was witnessed by John Roberts governor, Edward Mashborne deputy governor, William Marden third in council, Daniel Griffeth fourth in council, Matthew Bazett fifth in council, and Thomas [...reef[...]] as register. Interpretations The grantee Matthew Bazett also signed in his capacity as fifth in council, attesting to his own deed alongside the rest of the senior quorum. The double role illustrates the small literate circle on which the 1711 framework depended and the unavoidable overlap between those who administered the system and those whose holdings it confirmed. The signature served not as a check on Bazett's own grant, which was already certified by the consultation procedure, but as part of the |

Bazett's case moved through the procedure on a tight timetable, in contrast to the 12-year reach-back used for the Grace Coulson confirmations of the same day, which rested on a 1699 finding. The compressed schedule fits a holding determined and confirmed within the 1711 programme itself rather than imported from earlier administrative records. Bazett's known role as practical surveyor receiving warrants to measure and lay out land places him at the centre of the 1711 measurement operation. His own parcels passing through the same procedure he administered exposes the institutional tension between officer and beneficiary, and the council resolved it by routing his claim through the standard beat of drum notice rather than by special exemption. The 25-acre confirmation forms part of Bazett's broader accumulation. He had previously acquired 10 acres at Sheel Valley from George Dweight on a bill of sale of 2 September 1694, 5 acres adjoining from Jonathan Higham on a bill of sale of 19 December 1706, and 10 acres at the head of Deep Valley from Jonathan Mudge. The present 25-acre confirmation enlarges his recorded holding while preserving the boundary relationships fixed in those earlier deeds. The southern boundary of the gumwood parcel against William Seale and John Mudge places the new parcel adjacent to or near Bazett's earlier acquisition from Jonathan Mudge. The Mudge family name persists across two generations as an east-side boundary holder, indicating the durable territorial presence of the household around Bazett's growing estate. The cabbage tree parcel sits between Henry Coales on the north, Thomas Allis senior on the east, and John Welch on the south and west. Thomas Allis senior reappears as a substantial east-side holder, with the qualifier senior distinguishing him from a younger Thomas Allis already in the field. Henry Coales as the northern boundary preserves the family name first noted in the 1682 inquest holdings in Pleasant Valley and later in the chain of the James Valley dwelling at Cleve's resale to Greentree. The witness panel reproduces the senior council quorum used in the Coulson confirmations of the same day, with the deputy governor styled Edward Mashborne in a variant of Walkborne. The continuity of the signing panel across multiple confirmations executed in a single sitting indicates that 23 June 1711 was a working day of grant business at the Castle, with the council moving through several holders in sequence. The conditional clause requiring allegiance to Queen Anne and obedience to the laws of the island reproduces the standard tenure formula and preserves the residual sanction of forfeiture for disobedience. Speculations Routing Bazett's confirmation through the standard procedure, with full beat of drum notice and council attestation, rather than relying on his administrative position to record the holding informally, protected the system itself against any later allegation that his role as surveyor had been used to secure unearned grants. The procedural formality answered the structural conflict of interest by ensuring that the documentary record of his title could not be distinguished from that of any other freeholder. The same-day execution of the Coulson freehold confirmations, the Coulson lease and the Bazett freehold confirmation suggests the council scheduled clusters of holders together to economise on the assembly of the senior quorum. Bringing the surveyor's own confirmation within the same sitting as those of other holders he had measured for placed the documentary verification of his |

The property lay in the High Street of James Town in Chapel Valley, and was known as Captain Goodwin's House, having been purchased earlier by Goodwin from the late Edward Edmunds gentleman. The house adjoined the house of George Coulson on the west; the High Street and the house and land formerly held by Captain Hark[ins] on the south; the Company's waste land at the foot of the hill on the east; and further Company waste land and Cock Hill on the south. A passage or alley ran through the lower part of the property leading to Rock Hill. The consideration was £285 0s 0d in good and current island money, paid in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Carne and his wife conveyed to Francis and his heirs or assigns the house, the outhouses, the parcels of land and all rights, profits and enjoyments that they, their predecessors or heirs had held or might have held in respect of the property. They warranted that at the sealing and delivery of the deed they had full power and lawful authority to make the sale. They bound themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators to keep Francis and his heirs and assigns free from all claims, suits, troubles, charges or taxations that might arise against him in respect of the property. The deed was sealed on 25 May 1715, the first year of the reign of King George. |

In witness whereof Wee have hereunto Sett our hands &amp; Seals this 25 day of May Anno Domini 1715. and in the first year of His Maj[est]ies reigne of Signed Sealed &amp; George Carne Deliv[r]ed in p[re]sence of. Francis [...] A True Copy Registred G[od]f[r]e[d] S[harles] [...] H Joseph Tho[m]son E[d] [...] Toveh[y] | It was signed and sealed in the presence of Francis [...], with a true copy registered by Godfred Sharles [...], Joseph Thomson and Ed[...] Tovehy. George Carne signed in his own hand. Interpretations The identification of Frances Carne as widow of the late Thomas Goodwin and his sole executrix establishes the route by which the property reached her present husband. Goodwin had bought the house from Edward Edmunds on 10 May 1700 for £130 0s 0d sterling, and his death by 1715 left the estate with Frances, who retained executorial control on remarriage. The marriage to George Carne brought the most prominent urban property in the Goodwin estate into the Carne household without disturbing the underlying executorial title. Carne's new wife brought Goodwin's principal urban tenement into the marriage, but it was George Carne who signed the conveyance as the dominant party, with the consideration receipted in joint names. The form preserves the proprietary interest of Frances in her capacity as executrix while routing the actual transaction through her husband, reflecting the legal subordination of a married woman's property to her husband even where the underlying title rested in her own right. The property's working byname Captain Goodwin's House preserves the institutional memory of the former governor's tenure across the change of ownership. The chain of named occupiers (Edmunds, Goodwin, now Francis) reproduces the standard practice of identifying urban property by the previous holder's name rather than by a street number or fixed designation. The boundary description records George Coulson on the west, distinct from the Grace Coulson and Benony Coulson of the June 1711 freehold confirmations, and extends the Coulson family presence into the urban core of James Town. Captain Hark[ins] is named with the manuscript partly obscured, with the reading uncertain; his title of captain indicates a further military rank holder within the urban property circle alongside the earlier Captain Beale. The passage or alley running through the lower part of the property to Rock Hill records a public or semi-public right of way across private ground. The reservation of the passage within the conveyance preserves the access route as a feature of the property rather than something the new owner could close off, and reflects the dense urban configuration in which adjoining holders depended on shared passages to reach the surrounding ground. The price of £285 0s 0d in island currency stands well above the £130 0s 0d sterling Goodwin had paid Edmunds in 1700. The increase reflects both the addition of outhouses and improvements during the Goodwin tenure, and the difference between island and sterling currency, but it also marks the considerable appreciation of the High Street frontage during 15 years of growth in James Town. The price stands as the highest single urban transaction in the present series after the £350 0s 0d figures recorded for the Hoskison-Powell sale and the Lufkin-Company sale. The save-harmless covenant binding Carne and his wife and their heirs, executors and administrators to protect Francis against all claims, suits, troubles, charges or taxations gave the buyer the maximum available indemnity. The breadth of the wording answered the structural risk that an executorial sale might later be challenged by Goodwin heirs not party to the deed, by creditors of the late Thomas Goodwin or by holders of competing executorial interests. The reign year, given as the first of King George, fixes the deed within the early Hanoverian succession |

The decision to convert the holding into cash through a substantial single transaction released £285 0s 0d into the Carne household's working capital while the executorial period was still open, allowing the proceeds to be applied to Carne's mercantile activities or to the discharge of Goodwin's residual obligations. The choice of Henry Francis as buyer fits the documented pattern of Francis's accumulation in the same area, evidenced by his contemporary 1711 freehold confirmations of upland parcels and by his earlier 1709 purchase of the former Sherwin Fort James Valley dwelling from Thomas Goodwin for £50 0s 0d. The 1715 sale extended the relationship between Francis and the Goodwin estate into the most valuable single property in the Goodwin portfolio, with the prior dealings probably establishing the trust and familiarity that allowed the transaction to be brought to terms at a high price without external brokerage. The preservation of the passage to Rock Hill within the conveyance, rather than its quiet absorption into the property, points to the council's underlying interest in maintaining access routes across James Town as the urban fabric became increasingly built up. The express recording of the alley as a feature of the property protected the public access against any later attempt by Francis or his successors to close it off, and reflects the institutional priority of through-routes within the narrow valley setting of the town. |

|                    |                 | The Plot and Plan of the above said Land being hereunto Annexed Also a Copy of this Deed and Plan Entered in the Register Book Sealed and Delivered in p[rese]nce of us John Roberts Gov[r] W[m] M[a]rsden 2 in Council Daniel Griffith 3 in Council Matthew Bazett 4 in Council Thomas [...ree[...]] Register | The consultation date and the date of confirmation coincide, marking the same-day determination and execution of Swallow's title. Unlike the Grace Coulson confirmations, which reached back to a 1699 consultation, and unlike the Bazett confirmation, which followed a 13 June 1711 consultation by 10 days, Swallow's case was determined and confirmed in a single sitting. The compressed procedure indicates uncontested title proved on the spot before the council without the need for a separate confirmation date. The qualifier senior identifies a younger Thomas Swallow already in the field, distinguishing the present grantee from his son or namesake. The use of the term within the formal grant fixes the elder Swallow's identity for the documentary record at a point when generational succession had become a recurring source of confusion in island land holding. The Swallow family had previously appeared in the records as Thomas Swallow holding a parcel adjoining Mr Robert Swallow in the 1682 inquest, and the present grantee was very probably the same man confirmed in his original allotment more than 29 years after the inquest. The 1711 confirmation thus converts a 1682 working possession into a documented freehold under the new framework. The southern boundary against land that Swallow hired from the Company introduces the term hires as a working description of leasehold tenure. The boundary description thus records the combined freehold and leasehold composition of Swallow's working estate, with both interests held by the same person but tied to different institutional regimes. Paul Charles's children appear as the eastern boundary holders, indicating that the substantial Sandy Bay leasehold extended to Paul Charles in March 1705 under the 99-year extension had passed on his death to his children, and that the household had developed sufficient territorial presence by 1711 to serve as a recognised boundary reference. James Ve[ss]y is named with the manuscript partly obscured at the surname, with the reading uncertain. The recital that his land was formerly held by John [Caverley?] preserves the chain of earlier holding across at least two named occupiers, though both names are imperfectly legible. Carrying forward the earlier owner's name reproduces the standard practice of fixing parcels by reference to their documented history. The witness panel records William Marsden as second in council and Daniel Griffith as third in council, marking a further upward movement within the council hierarchy. Edward Walkborne, who had appeared as deputy governor on the freehold confirmations of 9 June 1711 and 23 June 1711, does not feature on the panel for the 20 July sitting, and Marsden has moved up from third to second. The absence of the deputy governor and the upward shift in council numbering point to changes in council attendance over the summer of 1711 rather than to a single fixed quorum. The conditional clause requiring true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne and obedience to the laws of the island gave the Company the residual sanction of forfeiture for disobedience, preserving the political dimension of the tenure alongside the property interest. The Main Ridge as northern boundary places the parcel along the principal topographical spine of the island, fixing the holding by reference to a permanent feature that needed no further description and required no surveying to identify on the ground. Speculations The same-day determination and confirmation of Swallow's title suggests the council was working through clear cases on the spot, with the procedure compressed for holders whose title was uncontested and whose physical occupation had been long established. The decision to use the senior council quorum even for such streamlined |

The freehold confirmation locked in the core block under the most secure tenure, while the adjoining hired ground remained on the 21-year terms that the 1711 framework imposed on new leases. The configuration preserves the option of converting the hired ground to freehold at a future hearing if circumstances permitted, while ensuring that the long-occupied core was already protected. The absence of any accompanying leasehold instrument on the same day, in contrast to the Coulson freehold-plus-lease package executed on 23 June 1711, suggests Swallow had already secured his leasehold position separately and was using the present sitting only to convert his existing core holding into confirmed freehold. The staggered treatment of the two tenures within his estate indicates that the 1711 programme accommodated holders whose dealings with the Company had developed over time, rather than imposing a uniform single-day package on every case.                                                                                                                                                    |

It was bounded to the north and east by Swallow's own land, to the south by the land of Thomas Gurgens, and to the west by the land of John Robinson. The second parcel, of 10 acres, was bounded to the north by the Main Ridge, to the east and south by Swallow's own land, and to the west by the land of the late Onesiphorus Steward. The lease ran to Thomas Swallow senior and his executors, administrators and assigns for 21 years from 25 March 1711. Swallow and his successors were required to bear true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne, her heirs and successors, and to the Company and its successors, and to obey all the laws and constitutions of the island. The annual rent was 5s 0d per acre, made up of 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty, payable in good and current island money on Lady Day, 25 March. At the end of the 21-year term he was to leave the fences in as good repair as at the start. The fences served as his legal landmarks and as the basis for the plan annexed to the lease, and were not to be altered. He was not to dispose of the lease or his interest in it without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time. |

Tho[mas] Swallow Signed and Delivered in the Presence of us Dan[ie]ll Griffith 3 in Councill Matthew Bazett 4[th] in Coun[n] Thomas [...]ree[...] Register | The Company set its common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 20 July 1711, and Thomas Swallow set his hand and seal to the counterpart. The instrument was witnessed by Daniel Griffeth third in council, Matthew Bazett fourth in council, and Thomas [...]ree[...] as register. Interpretations The same-day pairing of this lease with Swallow's freehold confirmation completes the institutional package by which a holder's confirmed freehold core was supplemented by 21 years of leasehold on adjoining ground. The southern boundary of Swallow's freehold parcel had recorded land that he hired from the Company, and the present instrument formalises that hired ground within the 1711 leasehold framework. The two instruments together convert Swallow's previously composite tenure into two clearly documented interests under different institutional regimes. The rent formula expressed as 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty, with the bracketed parenthesis treating the duty as additional to the per-acre rate, produces an apparent total of 5s 0d per acre rather than the flat 5s 0d per annum that smaller leases such as Grace Coulson's 5-acre parcel had attracted. Swallow's 31 acres at 5s 0d per acre would generate £7 15s 0d per annum, a substantial rent that places his leasehold among the more valuable in the 1711 series. The first parcel adjoins Swallow's freehold land on two of its four sides, and the second parcel does so on three. The configuration produces a continuous block of confirmed freehold and leasehold tenure, allowing Swallow to work the combined estate as a single agricultural unit while the underlying titles remained separate. The arrangement minimises duplication of fencing, access and cultivation arrangements across the combined holding. The boundary description records Onesiphorus Steward as deceased, fixing his death before 20 July 1711. The Puritan first name Onesiphorus parallels the late Onesipherus Sheado mentioned in the consultation book cross-references of February 1716 and the late Onesiphorus Quinney recorded as an earlier holder adjoining John Matthews. The recurrence of the unusual given name across three families indicates the persistence of Puritan naming traditions within sections of the island population, perhaps reflecting common origin or shared religious background. The boundary holders Thomas Gurgens and John Robinson on the Sandy Bay parcel place Swallow's holding within a substantial Sandy Bay cluster that also included the Paul Charles family, James Vessy and the holdings recorded in Reder's grant. John Robinson here is probably the same John Robinson recorded in the cross-references to consultation book 15 folios 39 and 40 as having given bond with sureties for the children of the late Onesipherus Sheado. The witness panel further compresses from the freehold confirmation of the same day, dropping the governor and the second in council and retaining only the third, fourth and register. The matched pairing of senior quorum for freehold confirmation and reduced quorum for leasehold within the same sitting confirms the deliberate hierarchical distinction between the two instrument types under the 1711 framework. Swallow signed in his own hand and set his seal to the counterpart. The signature places him within the literate class of free planters whose direct signatures appear on the documentary record, distinguishing him from the many holders whose attestation was by mark. The disposal restriction requiring the consent of the governor and council reproduces the standard 1711 clause and keeps the leasehold under continuing institutional supervision throughout its 21-year term. Speculations |

The 21-year term commencing from 25 March 1711 thus does not mark the start of his physical occupation but the formalisation of an established working arrangement under the standard rate and conditions. The substantial size of the leasehold relative to the freehold (31 acres against 40) indicates that Swallow's working estate was weighted toward leasehold rather than confirmed freehold, in contrast to holders such as Henry Francis whose confirmed freehold of 40 acres dominated a smaller 25-acre leasehold. The composition reflects the relative cost of acquiring the two tenures and the apparent willingness of the council to extend leasehold quickly while reserving freehold confirmation for ground with longer established title. The substantial rent burden of 31 acres at 5s 0d per acre, generating £7 15s 0d per annum, points to a holding whose productive output sustained a significant ongoing cash obligation to the Company. The leasehold thus served not only as a private acquisition of cultivable ground but also as a source of regular institutional revenue, and the combined freehold-leasehold structure aligned the Company's collection interest with the holder's working capacity to pay.  |

The parcel formed part of 20 acres formerly the lot of the late Joseph Church, minister. The transfer was made for love and affection, with no monetary consideration recited. The Toveys conveyed to Mary Maxwell and her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns for ever all right, title, interest, claim or demand they held in the parcel. The conveyance covered any part or parcel of the ground, including any portion in the possession of Mary, the wife of John Orchard, or any other person, with the manuscript imperfectly legible at the qualifying phrase. They granted to her full power and possession, to her sole use and benefit for ever. The Toveys set their hands and seals on 18 June 1713. The deed was sealed and delivered with quit possession given by the delivery of a piece of wax in accordance with the effect of the writing. The original witnesses were Thomas Allis senior, Thomas Allis junior, Henry Francis and Sam Green, with the manuscript torn at the lower edge so that part of their names had been damaged. A note records that two of the witnesses (Thomas Allis senior and Henry Francis) were still living when the copy was attested.                                                                                                                                                      |

The form converts the transaction into a family or personal disposition rather than a commercial sale, and the absence of any price closes off the ordinary contractual remedies available to a buyer for failure of title. The lifelong nature of the gift to Mary Maxwell and her heirs and assigns nevertheless gives her the same documentary security against future claims as a purchased freehold would have provided. The qualifier spinster identifies Mary Maxwell as an unmarried woman holding land in her own name. Her standing places her alongside the substantial widows recorded across the present series, but also adds the further category of the unmarried adult woman receiving land in fee. The institutional protection thus extended to women across the full range of marital status: spinster, wife (through joint conveyances), widow, executrix and attorney for an absent husband. The recital that the parcel formed part of 20 acres formerly the lot of the late Joseph Church, minister, identifies an earlier ecclesiastical holder. The minister category records the presence of a settled chaplain or clergyman holding lot land within the same allotment framework that applied to lay free planters. Joseph Church's death and the subsequent fragmentation of his 20-acre lot indicate that ministerial holdings were treated as ordinary inheritable estates rather than as institutional benefices reserved for successors in the office. The reference to land in the possession of Mary, the wife of John Orchard, within the original 20-acre Church lot suggests the lot had been partitioned across several recipients after Church's death. The Toveys' present 4-acre share represented one fragment of the original block, and Mary Orchard held another. The arrangement points to the parcel having reached the Tovey household through inheritance or earlier disposition from Church's estate, with the present deed transferring forward the portion held by the Toveys. The quit possession formality recorded by the delivery of a piece of wax preserves a symbolic ritual of livery of seisin within the documentary conveyance. The act fixed the moment of transfer at the physical handing over of an object representing the land, and the formal record of the symbolic act gave the deed its character as a completed grant rather than a mere promise to convey. The use of wax rather than the older medieval forms of turf, twig or key indicates a localised adaptation of the English ceremonial tradition, perhaps tied to the documentary materials immediately to hand. The damage to the lower edge of the original deed, with part of the witness names torn off, prompted the certified true copy to record that two of the witnesses were still living. The note preserved the deed's evidential value by establishing that the attestation could be confirmed through surviving witnesses, even though the original signatures could no longer be read in full. The 1717 registration thus served not only to copy the instrument forward into the register but also to authenticate it against the risk of future challenge based on the damaged original. The witness panel includes Thomas Allis senior and Thomas Allis junior together, fixing the generational succession within the Allis household at execution. Thomas Allis senior had earlier built up a substantial Deep Valley estate through purchases from Tomps, Stevens, Hemmons, Miller and Child between 1689 and 1704, and his appearance alongside his son here records the household at a moment of generational continuity. |

Antipas Tovey appearing as register at the certification confirms his succession within the register office, building on the Tovey family connection to that role recorded in earlier instruments. Speculations The choice to convey the 4 acres outright by gift rather than to settle the parcel by will reflects a desire to fix Mary Maxwell's title during the Toveys' lifetimes rather than to leave her interest contingent on testamentary administration. The form gave her an immediate, vested freehold that could not be challenged or diminished by any later change in the Toveys' circumstances, by debts of their estate, or by claims of other family members on either of their deaths. The decision to register the deed four years after execution, prompted apparently by physical damage to the original, indicates that the Toveys and Mary Maxwell had relied on the unregistered deed for some years and turned to formal registration only when the deteriorating document raised the risk that the title might become unprovable. The 1717 attestation preserving the names of two surviving witnesses converted the register entry into a documentary substitute for the damaged original, securing the gift against future challenge. The express reservation against any part or parcel held by Mary, the wife of John Orchard, suggests an existing or potential boundary issue within the fragmented former Church lot. The Toveys conveyed only their own portion and disclaimed any interest in the ground held by Mary Orchard, anticipating dispute that might otherwise arise as the boundaries between the several fragments became indistinct. The wording protected Mary Maxwell against later allegation that her gift had encroached on the Orchard share, while leaving the existing Orchard interest undisturbed. |

The 20 July 1711 sitting at the Castle thus processed at least the Swallow freehold confirmation, the Swallow lease and the present Gurgen confirmation, with the council quorum carried through across the multiple instruments executed in sequence. Gurgen had already appeared as the southern boundary holder on Swallow's 21-acre Sandy Bay leasehold parcel under the lease of the same day. The confirmation of his own 10 acres on the same date fixes the bilateral boundary at one administrative pass, with both adjoining holders documented to the same line. The procedural coordination removed any later dispute between Swallow and Gurgen at the precise moment of mutual recognition. The boundary description records two distinct categories of leasehold ground adjoining the confirmed freehold. To the east lies land hired from the Company by Thomas Parkins, and to the west lies land hired from the Company by Gurgen himself. The dual reference to hired ground on both flanks of the confirmed freehold places the 10-acre core within a larger working block of mixed tenure. Gurgen's combined working estate thus included confirmed freehold at the centre and adjoining leasehold to the west, with neighbouring Company leasehold held by Parkins to the east. The term hires reappears as the standard working description of leasehold ground under the 1711 framework, consistent with its use in the Swallow freehold confirmation of the same day. The terminology distinguished active leasehold occupation from the formal confirmed freehold without requiring the more legalistic term demised. James Vesey appears again as the southern boundary holder, having featured on the western boundary of Swallow's freehold parcel. His presence around both Swallow and Gurgen indicates an established Vesey holding at the meeting point of several smaller estates in the area below the Main Ridge. The earlier holder of the Vesey ground, recorded in the Swallow confirmation as John Caverley with the surname imperfectly legible, is not repeated in the present description. The witness panel reproduces exactly the senior council quorum used for Swallow's freehold confirmation of the same day: the governor, the second in council, the third in council, the fourth in council and the register. The continuity of the panel across the day's confirmations confirms the stable composition of the senior quorum throughout the sitting. The conditional clause requiring true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne and obedience to the laws of the island reproduces the standard tenure formula. The clause preserved the residual sanction of forfeiture for disobedience and maintained the political dimension of the tenure alongside the property interest. The relatively modest 10-acre size of the confirmed freehold contrasts with the 40-acre confirmation issued to Swallow on the same day. The 1711 framework operated across holdings of substantially different scales, with the same procedural apparatus and council quorum applied to confirmations whether the underlying acreage was 10 or 40 or more. The institutional cost of confirmation did not scale with the size of the holding, indicating the council's interest in bringing all freeholders within the documentary regime regardless of individual scale. Speculations Routing Gurgen's confirmation through the same sitting as Swallow's, and fixing their mutual boundary on the same day, suggests deliberate co-location of adjoining holders within the council's business schedule. Bringing neighbours forward together allowed the boundary line |

The proportion reverses the pattern seen in Henry Francis's case, where 40 acres of confirmed freehold dominated 25 acres of leasehold, and points to differential household strategies for combining the two tenures under the 1711 framework. The simultaneous treatment of Swallow's 40-acre freehold and Gurgen's adjoining 10-acre freehold within a single sitting also offered the council an efficient means of clearing the bounded ground between two recognised holdings. With both adjoining holders confirmed in their respective freeholds on the same date, the remaining Company waste and Company leasehold ground around them could be administered without ambiguity about which parcels were already in private hands. The procedure thus served both the immediate interests of the holders and the longer-term cartographic clarity of the Company's land register.  |

He was not to dispose of the lease or his interest in it without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time. The Company set its common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 20 July 1711, and Thomas Gargen set his hand and seal to the counterpart with the initial of his given name imperfectly legible in the manuscript. The instrument was witnessed by Daniel Griffeth third in council, Matthew Bazett fourth in council, and Thomas [...]ree[...] as register. Interpretations The lease pairs with Gargen's same-day freehold confirmation of 10 acres, producing a combined working estate of 30 acres made up of 10 acres of confirmed freehold and 20 acres of 21-year leasehold. The structure replicates the same-day freehold-plus-lease packaging used for Henry Francis on 9 June 1711, for Grace Coulson on 23 June 1711 and for Thomas Swallow senior earlier on 20 July 1711. The boundary description records the leased parcel adjoining Gargen's own freehold land on the east. The configuration places the confirmed core and the leased extension as a continuous block, allowing the combined ground to be worked as a single agricultural unit while the underlying titles remained separate. The same arrangement was used in the Swallow lease, in the Henry Francis lease and in the Grace Coulson lease, indicating a deliberate institutional preference for placing new leasehold parcels in physical continuity with confirmed freehold rather than scattered across distant ground. The northern boundary against the land of Paul Charles's children fixes the limits of the Charles household holding at the date of the lease, with the children rather than the parent named as the boundary holders. Paul Charles had taken the original 99-year extension on his Sandy Bay leasehold from the Company on 13 March 1705, and his children appear as the successors in tenure by July 1711, indicating his death or retirement from active holding within the intervening six years. The rent computation expressed in the manuscript as 4s 0d per acre plus 1s 0d duty, parenthesised as in all 5s 0d per annum, produces an internal inconsistency on the 20-acre parcel. Read literally, the per-acre rate would yield £4 0s 0d per annum on the 20 acres, plus 1s 0d duty, for a total of £4 1s 0d per annum, but the parenthesis treats the combined rate as 5s 0d per annum in total. The same inconsistency appears in the Henry Francis lease and the Grace Coulson lease but resolves cleanly on a 5-acre or 5-acre type holding. On Gargen's 20 acres the literal reading of 5s 0d per acre would produce £5 0s 0d per annum and is the more probable institutional construction, since the standard 4s 0d plus 1s 0d duty applied per acre across the 1711 leasehold framework. The witness panel matches that used for Swallow's lease of the same day, dropping the governor and the second in council and retaining only the third in council, the fourth in council and the register. The matched pairing of senior quorum for freehold confirmation and reduced quorum for leasehold within the same sitting confirms the deliberate hierarchical distinction between the two instrument types. The signatory line records the lessee's name as J[?] Gargen with the initial of the given name imperfectly legible, alongside the body of the document which records him as Thomas Gargen and the freehold confirmation of the same day which records him as Thomas Gurgen. The variant spellings within a single sitting fall within the normal range of scribal variation in the 1711 register and do not affect the substantive identity of the holder. The disposal restriction requiring the consent of the governor and council reproduces the standard 1711 clause and keeps the leasehold under continuing institutional supervision throughout its 21-year term. |

The 21-year term commencing from 25 March 1711 thus probably did not mark the start of his physical occupation of the parcel but the regularisation of an established working arrangement under the 1711 framework. The proportion of leasehold to freehold (20 acres to 10) places Gargen among holders whose working estate was weighted toward leasehold rather than confirmed freehold. The reversed balance, compared with Henry Francis's 25 acres of leasehold against 40 acres of confirmed freehold, points to differential household strategies under the 1711 programme. Some holders sought principally to lock in long-established freehold cores, while others, including Gargen, used the new framework primarily to bring substantial leasehold ground under documented tenure. The smaller 10-acre size of Gargen's confirmed freehold, combined with the 20-acre leasehold and the further hired ground noted in the freehold confirmation, suggests his household relied heavily on Company tenure to assemble a viable working estate. The Company's willingness to extend such substantial leasehold beside a small confirmed freehold indicates an institutional preference for keeping marginal or recently cleared ground under shorter-term tenure rather than transferring it outright through freehold grant.  |

|                    |                 | this Twentieth day of July, In the Year of Our Lord One thousand Seven Hundred and Eleven.The Plot and Plan of the abovesaid Land being hereunto Annexed also a Copy of this Deed and Plan entered in the Reg[is]ter bookSealed and Delivered in the Presence of Us Jn[o] Roberts Govern[r] W[m] M[a]rsden 2 in Coun[c] Daniel Griffeth 3 in Coun[c] Matthew Bazell 4 in Coun[c] Thomas [...]ree[...] Register | Griffeth third in council, Matthew Bazett fourth in council, and Thomas [...]ree[...] as register. Interpretations The grantee Walter Belward is the same active trader who had bought a 10-acre plantation from Arthur and Sarah Bradley on 18 October 1705 for 100 Spanish dollars and four head of cattle, who had then acquired the Sharks Valley estate and the associated 6-acre Company leasehold from George Dweight on 8 June 1708 for £170 0s 0d, and who had then sold 10 acres in Fryer Valley to Richard Gurling on 17 August 1708 for £70 0s 0d. The present confirmation brings him within the documentary regime of the 1711 framework after a series of substantial purchases and sales spanning the preceding six years. The consultation date and the date of confirmation coincide, matching the same-day procedure used for Swallow and Gargen on the same day. The 20 July 1711 sitting at the Castle thus processed at least four documented confirmations and two leases in sequence, with the council quorum maintained across the day's business. The northern boundary against land that Belward himself hired from the Company places his confirmed freehold core directly against his own leasehold ground. The configuration repeats the pattern noted in Swallow's and Gargen's confirmations, in which holders held adjoining hired ground that fell within the 1711 framework. The continuity of confirmed freehold and leasehold within a single working estate appears as a consistent institutional feature of the present sitting's grants. The bounded ground against the Company's waste on two sides (east and south) places Belward's freehold core on the edge of unenclosed Company ground, with cultivation extending only to the western and northern flanks where it met John Penney's land and Belward's own leasehold respectively. The configuration marks the freehold as a frontier holding rather than a parcel embedded within an established cluster of private estates. John Penney appears as a new holder in the present sequence, recorded only by name and as the western boundary. The absence of earlier reference to Penney in the preceding records indicates either a recent arrival or a smaller holder whose tenure had not previously generated a documented transaction. The 1711 confirmations are useful for identifying such peripheral holders, since adjacent freeholders had to be named even where their own titles were not under review. The witness panel reproduces the senior council quorum used in the Swallow and Gargen freehold confirmations of the same day: the governor, the second in council, the third in council, the fourth in council and the register. The continuity of attendance across multiple confirmations executed in sequence confirms the stable composition of the senior quorum throughout the 20 July 1711 sitting. The absence of any accompanying leasehold instrument for Belward on the same day, in contrast to the freehold-plus-lease packaging used for Swallow and Gargen, indicates that his hired ground to the north was either already covered by a separate existing leasehold arrangement or was being deferred to a later sitting. The omission suggests the 1711 programme accommodated holders whose dealings with the Company had developed at different paces, rather than imposing a uniform package on every case. The conditional clause requiring true faith and allegiance to Queen Anne and obedience to the laws of the island reproduces the standard tenure formula, preserving the residual sanction of forfeiture for disobedience. Speculations Belward's appearance before the council in July 1711 for confirmation of just 10 acres, after a documented six-year pattern of buying and selling much larger parcels, |

His earlier transactions had cycled estates of 10 to 18 acres through his hands at high prices, but the present 10-acre confirmation came forward through the 1711 framework as a long-term home base secured under the most stable tenure available, separated from his trading activities. The presence of adjoining hired ground to the north, recorded but not separately leased at the present sitting, suggests Belward had already brought that parcel under leasehold before the 1711 programme commenced or was in the process of negotiating its terms outside the immediate freehold business. The decoupling of freehold confirmation from leasehold execution in his case contrasts with the same-day packaging arranged for Swallow and Gargen, and indicates that the 1711 procedure was administered case by case rather than as a single uniform process. The placement of the confirmed freehold against unenclosed Company waste on two sides points to the value Belward placed on securing the boundary line at the outer edge of cultivation. By converting the inner boundary of his working estate into confirmed freehold protected by formal plan and register entry, he locked the Company out of any future decision to lease or grant the adjoining waste in ways that might encroach on his established cultivation. The strategic placement of the confirmed core thus served not only to protect existing use but also to anchor a defensible line against future institutional decisions about the surrounding ground.  |

He was not to dispose of the lease or his interest in it without the consent of the governor and council in office at the time. The Company set its common seal at the Castle in James Valley on 20 July 1711, and Walter Belward set his hand and seal to the counterpart. The instrument was witnessed by Daniel Griffeth third in council, Matthew Bazett fourth in council, and Thomas [...reef...] as register. On 1 August 1712 the governor and council, acting on behalf of and in the management of the Company, assigned the 6 acres of gumwood land to Robert Bell of the island on the same terms and conditions. The assignment was signed by Benjamin Bouchet as governor, with the office reading uncertain in the manuscript, John Black and Matthew Bazett, and was registered on 15 September 1712 by John Alexander as register. Interpretations The pairing of this lease with Belward's same-day freehold confirmation completes the institutional package by which his confirmed freehold core of 10 acres was supplemented by 6 acres of leasehold extension. The bounded ground against the Company waste on two sides (north and west) and against Belward's own freehold land on the other two (east and south) places the leasehold parcel as a frontier extension projecting from his confirmed core into otherwise unenclosed Company ground. The arrangement matches the configuration noted in the Henry Francis lease and the Grace Coulson lease, with leasehold acting as the outer ring beyond the confirmed freehold centre. The freehold confirmation issued earlier the same day had referred to land that Belward hired from the Company on its northern boundary, with no separate lease instrument executed at that earlier point in the sitting. The present lease may therefore record either a fresh leasehold arrangement executed later in the day or the formalisation of the existing hired ground noted in the freehold confirmation. The bounded direction of the leasehold (north and west of his freehold), set against the earlier reference to hired ground on the freehold's northern boundary only, indicates that at least one side of the present lease covers ground beyond the parcel referenced in the freehold confirmation. The 1 August 1712 assignment to Robert Bell, executed only just over a year after the original grant of the lease, marks a significant institutional development. The disposal clause of the original lease had required the consent of the governor and council to any assignment, and the present transfer satisfies that requirement through an instrument executed by the governor and council themselves on behalf of the Company. The form of the assignment, with the council acting in the Company's management capacity rather than simply granting consent to a private assignment by Belward, suggests the council took the parcel back from Belward and re-issued it to Bell rather than approving a transfer between the two private parties. The assignment signatories include Benjamin Bouchet, recorded as governor in the manuscript with the office partly unclear. The appearance of Bouchet replaces the John Roberts who had held the office at the freehold confirmations of June and July 1711, indicating a change in the chief office during the intervening 13 months. John Black appears alongside Bazett on the panel as another council member, while Bazett continues from the original 1711 lease. The continuity of Bazett across both instruments preserved institutional knowledge of the parcel through the transition. The registration of the assignment on 15 September 1712 by John Alexander as register marks his apparent return to the office after Thomas Greene had served as register through the June and July 1711 confirmations. The absence of any consideration figure within the assignment instrument distinguishes it from the private leasehold assignments recorded in earlier deeds such as the Heath to Charles transfer of March 1705, which had carried £60 0s 0d. The recital of the same terms and conditions in the assignment preserves the rent, duty, fencing covenants and disposal restrictions of the original lease. Bell thus took on the parcel under exactly the obligations originally accepted by Belward, with no variation in price, term length or covenant content. The institutional framework remained constant across the change of tenant. Speculations The decision of the governor and council to assign the lease themselves, rather than merely consenting to a private transfer, points to active institutional supervision of the leasehold's onward circulation. Belward's pattern of buying and selling at considerable profit across 1705 to 1708 may have prompted the council to keep the present parcel under direct institutional control rather than allowing it to enter Belward's trading portfolio. The form of the assignment subordinates the leasehold's commercial value to the Company's interest in the identity of the tenant. The reassignment to Robert Bell, named as planter and mason in the William Alexander lease of 7 May 1717, suggests the parcel passed to a holder whose artisanal trade complemented its agricultural use. The Company's preference for transferring the leasehold to a working planter rather than allowing it to be sublet or sold on by Belward indicates a policy of matching tenants to ground based on their capacity to develop it under the standard 1711 obligations. Bell's combined planting and masonry skills would have fitted him to satisfy the fence-maintenance and improvement covenants of the lease. The short period between original grant and reassignment, coupled with the absence of a recorded purchase price in the assignment, raises the possibility that Belward surrendered the lease to the Company without immediate consideration in exchange for some other accommodation not recorded in the present instrument. The reassignment of the same ground to Bell on the same terms, executed by the council in the Company's name, would then represent a fresh grant rather than a transfer, with the institutional record presenting the transaction in continuity with the original lease for documentary convenience.  |

Giles Hayes Sealed Signed &amp; Delivered in the presence of Jno Alexander Antipas Tovey Rich[d] Alexander [...]ne 1714 [...]ealed | lot land of William Hayes. The 5 acres lay adjacent to the land of Sutton Isaack, who had purchased the other 5 acres from Thomas Hayes, and to Isaac Wood's own land. The consideration was £30 0s 0d in good and current island money, received in hand before the sealing and delivery of the deed. Hayes conveyed to Wood and his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns the 5 acres together with all appurtenances, including walls, hedges, ditches, banks, party fences, water and watercourses, with all other rights, liberties, privileges and profits. The land was to be held by Wood and his heirs for ever, to use and dispose of at their will and pleasure. Hayes covenanted that Wood and his heirs would hold, occupy, possess and quietly enjoy the parcel without molestation, interruption, contradiction or trouble from Hayes, his heirs, or anyone claiming under him. He warranted the title against any person claiming any right in the premises and bound himself to defend, keep harmless and indemnify Wood and his heirs. Hayes set his hand and seal on 5 September 1712, signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of John Alexander, Antipas Tovey and Richard Alexander. A further notation reads in part [...]ne 1714 [...]ealed, with the manuscript imperfectly legible at that point. Interpretations The grantor's status of montross identifies Hayes as a junior member of the artillery establishment, a soldier assisting the gunner in handling and maintaining the cannon. The category placed him within the garrison hierarchy below the gunner and gunner's mate, and his appearance as a seller of inherited lot land marks the continuing pattern by which garrison personnel disposed of inherited or acquired private estates while remaining in service. Isaac Wood's status as cooper and free planter reproduces the dual artisanal-agricultural classification noted in the 7 May 1717 William Alexander lease, in which Wood was named as a boundary holder under the same dual title. The combination of cooperage and planting placed him among the artisans whose trade skills supplemented their cultivation of free planter land. His presence as both buyer in 1712 and boundary holder in 1717 demonstrates the consolidation of his Fishers Valley estate over the intervening five years. The parcel's chain of fragmentation traces a 20-acre lot originally held by William Hayes, divided into two moieties of 10 acres each. One moiety was further divided into two 5-acre parcels, with Sutton Isaack acquiring the first 5 acres from Thomas Hayes and Isaac Wood now acquiring the second from Giles Hayes. The successive division illustrates how original 20-acre allotments fragmented across one or two generations into smaller parcels passed between holders by sale or inheritance. The buyers and sellers in the chain of fragmentation are linked by family ties not made explicit in the deed but identifiable through naming patterns. Giles Hayes, Thomas Hayes and the late William Hayes share a surname that points to a common family origin for the 20-acre lot, with Giles and Thomas probably brothers or cousins disposing of inherited fragments of the family estate to outside buyers Isaac Wood and Sutton Isaack. The price of £30 0s 0d for 5 acres of Fishers Valley ground produces a rate of £6 0s 0d per acre, well above the upland rate of £1 0s 0d to £2 0s 0d per acre recorded across the upland transactions of the present series. The premium reflects either the cultivated condition of the parcel, the inclusion of significant improvements among the appurtenances, or the higher market value of Fishers Valley ground relative to gumwood and cabbage tree uplands. The enumeration of appurtenances includes walls, hedges, ditches, banks and party fences alongside water and watercourses. The express inclusion of party fences |

The watercourse reference recalls the 13 March 1704 Sensney watercourse grant and the established practice of treating water rights as separate appurtenances within Fishers Valley conveyances. The save-harmless covenant given by Hayes binds him, his heirs, executors and administrators to protect Wood against any claim arising from his own dealings or those of persons claiming under him. The wording falls short of the comprehensive covenant given by Benjamin Miller in his 1704 sale to Thomas Allis, which had covered past and future acts by any person, but reaches further than the standard quiet enjoyment covenant of earlier garrison sales. The witness panel records John Alexander, Antipas Tovey and Richard Alexander. John Alexander's appearance here confirms his continuing presence in the field after the apparent succession of Thomas Greene as register through the June and July 1711 confirmations, and consistent with his re-emergence as register at the 15 September 1712 registration of the Belward-Bell assignment recorded only 10 days after the present deed. Antipas Tovey is the same grantor of the 18 June 1713 gift to Mary Maxwell, and Richard Alexander reproduces the family connection to John Alexander already established in earlier records. The partly illegible notation in 1714 may record either a later endorsement, an attestation by additional parties, or a registration entry made some 21 months after the original execution. The form is uncertain on the present reading and offers no clear institutional information without further access to the manuscript. Speculations The 5-acre size of the present parcel, identical to the 5-acre piece earlier acquired by Sutton Isaack from Thomas Hayes, suggests the Hayes family adopted a deliberate strategy of dividing inherited ground into uniform smaller units for separate sale. The pattern would have allowed each Hayes heir to realise cash from a discrete portion while leaving the wider family ground available for further partition or consolidation by outside buyers. The division into 5-acre fragments, rather than the more usual 10-acre or 20-acre units of the 1682 inquest, indicates a market for smaller plots that had developed by the early 1710s. The choice of Isaac Wood as buyer, given his existing land adjoining the parcel, points to a deliberate consolidation strategy on his side as well. Acquiring the 5 acres directly adjoining his existing holding allowed him to enlarge his Fishers Valley estate as a single working block, while leaving the adjoining 5-acre parcel already held by Sutton Isaack as a fixed external boundary. The transaction thus simultaneously served Hayes's interest in realising the value of inherited ground and Wood's interest in expanding his cultivated estate without disturbing established neighbours. The 1714 endorsement, although partly illegible, suggests the deed remained active within the documentary record beyond the original transaction. The most probable institutional purpose of such a later notation, in the absence of a clear price or party named, would have been confirmation of registration or a later attestation supporting the title against challenge. The pattern aligns with the Antipas Tovey practice noted in the 1713 gift to Mary Maxwell, where formal registration followed execution by some interval to secure the title under the registrar's authority. |
